The Girl From The Double R

By BETTY BLOCKINGER

CHAPTER IX

"No girl with a face like mine could expect romance. I knew there was healing in my hands, so I took nurse's training, then went on private duty. One day, I was called to take the case of a man named Byington. The woman at the registry kidded a little, said the man had money and that I might as well work for a bonus.

"I did. My bonus was marriage.

"Not until afterward did I learn where my husband's money came from. He was a small-time gambler who'd come into a string of race horses. We traveled with them. I learned how some races are won. I had the opportunity of using my nurse's training on those poor, mistreated beauties. I haunted veterinarian's offices. I read and studied. I learned all I could so that I could make life easier for my husband's meal tickets.

"I wasn't sorry when he lost them overnight at a gaming table.

"He lost me, too. My one reason for remaining with him — to help his horses— was gone. He said I'd left because he was broke, and he wanted me to go back to nursing to provide him with a stake. Because he was down and out, I foolishly did return to him for a while, and we lived on what I made as a nurse.

"Then, I learned that he'd been drawn into something worse than a gambling ring. This gang needed his 'gentlemanly' appearance, his 'front.' And he needed me to keep up that front. But I was through.

"I left him again and kept my whereabouts hidden. I gradually earned enough money to take veterinary training. It took me a while but I made the grade. And then, he found me out. I'd set up shop under the only name I could use legally. I had to get out, close shop, hide, because he wanted his cook back.

"I learned that Herb Westmore, with whom I'd gone through the veterinary school, needed an assistant. He was about to take over here, and I thought that, if he'd take me with him to this spot, thousands of miles from the city where my husband was, I could know some peace. I need not even use my name if I was to be only an assistant. Herb needed a housekeeper as well as an assistant. As we had the same background — we'd both grown up on cattle ranches —we decided that I could pose as his sister, have the protection of his name.

"We'd been here a few months when, while out shopping, I looked through a grocery store window and saw my husband pass. Herb checked and found that he was living at the hotel here. He was in and out of town—and his reputation was not savory."

Rusty's mind went flashing back to the night of the storm, to "the lesson." Herb had tried to teach her. Had it been the knowledge of this Byington's presence in the city that had prompted the warning?

And was this the reason for the warning he'd given Adelaide when Decker's men had come to the door?

"I refuse to run away again," Adelaide was concluding. "I'm of use here. Well, that's all. Better get some sleep."

"You'd better," Rusty said softly. "And, Adelaide, how about giving yourself a sedative this time?"

"I may. That Caesarian rather got me down. If I oversleep, call me. Promise?"

"I promise."

Rusty kept her promise. The next morning, she called Adelaide—but not until breakfast was prepared, one portion on a tray to be carried to the bedside.

"Here, here," protested Adelaide. "Just who is the hostess and who is the guest?"

Rusty pushed her back against piled-up pillows. For a few moments, a rigid back held the woman upright. Then she relaxed and sighed.

"This is the first breakfast I've ever had in bed. And I'm going to enjoy it! Where's the morning paper?"

"Propped up before Doctor Westmore, but I'll change that."

Rusty whisked into the dining room and snatched the newspaper away from his startled gaze. After taking it to Adelaide, she whisked back again.

"Eggs up or over?" she asked.

"Why—why—" he stammered. "Is Sis ill?"

"Not yet. I'm just breaking her into form. There isn't anything that we can't do this morning, is there?"

"We? No, not a thing thus far."

"Then let's find a good book for her and keep her in bed, Herb"—Rusty ventured the name timidly—"she's been sold short on love. Let's give her a little extra dose."

"Rusty..... Oh, darn that bell!" He broke off, as a clang sounded from the courtyard.

Rusty followed him out, then returned to report to Adelaide.

"Simple fracture. Man backed out of his driveway and didn't see the little pooch. He's suffering much worse than the dog."

"I had a six foot, two hundred pounder faint on me," confessed Adelaide. "Seems the bigger they are, the harder they fall for their pets. My"—she stretched luxuriously—"I've a notion just to let things ride today. But the Caesarian—"

"She's doing all right," Rusty hastened to report. "Now give me your shopping list and see what I can do to prove my worth in a kitchen."

Rusty had no time for thought that morning. A swift cleaning of the kitchen. Then she was at the kennels, parceling out food to the hungry. She put fresh papers in the hospital cages, fresh sand, fresh water. She scanned the individual diets and then coaxed the convalescents into taking nourishment.

Doctor Westmore was in and out preoccupied now, impersonal, even brusque at times.

Once he came in to stand by her and frown.

"You don't have to do this," he objected. "I—well, I'll be free in a moment."

"I'm enjoying it."

"Here—come into the office. I've a book there on injections I want you to read; first lesson. Take it out to that swing chair and learn something about the anatomical structure of the beef you're growing."

"After lunch—"

"Sorry; I won't have time for lunch."

Rusty went in to Adelaide. "What is the procedure when the doctor hasn't time for lunch?"

"A tray on the instrument cabinet. He catches snatches as he passes. Remind him he has a meeting with the cattlemen at eight o'clock tonight. I believe you're due there also. Mr. Decker was supposed to notify you last week. Of course he did."

Urges More Active Part Be Taken By Women In Governing Country

OTTAWA, Oct. 10 — (CP) — Perhaps there isn't another organization in Canada which has done more to improve the situation of rural women than the women's institutes, Mrs. Casneron Dow, Port Daniel West, Que., said today at a convention of the Eastern Ontario Women's Institute.

Emphasizing that 51 per cent of the voters in Canada are women, Mrs. Dow, president of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, told members it was up to Canadian women to take a more active part in the government of this country.

She noted that when Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt had been appointed to the chair of the Human Relations Committee of the United Nations, the latter had chosen her executive from 11 countries.

A copy of a letter expressing regret of the F.W.I.C. that Mrs Roosevelt was unable to have Canadian women on her committee "since our government had not included women in its delegation," was sent Prime Minister King, Mrs. Dow continued. "Probably many letters will be needed before our Prime Minister sees fit to right this situation."
