CURSE O' LOVE

A Story of Love and Its Ties

by MILDRED BARBOUR

CHAPTER 61.

THE HAPPY COINCIDENCE.

King Carson! Remembrance came suddenly to Basil Harcourt. He had heard Carson's name before. Ada Lind had mentioned him in telling Norma's pitiful story. Carson was the man who had gone to China to look for his friend, Norma's husband.

He leaned forward excitedly. "Listen," he said to Cynthia. "I have a plan. I think I know how we can find this mysterious husband of yours."

It was her turn to be amazed. "You know him?" she demanded incredulously.

He told her about Ada and Norma Kendall, and how he had met them at the fashionable resort. "It was Mrs. Kendall, evidently, who found the opal after you had lost it when your car was wrecked. I recall Mrs. Lind's telling me that the jewel was in a bag, along with a piece of paper that rain and mud had made indecipherable. That, undoubtedly, was your marriage certificate." He frowned and shivered. "My poor, poor little Cynthia!"

But Cynthia seemed to need no sympathy. Her eyes were sparkling. "How simple it all is, after all!" she cried. "And how amazing! What an astounding coincidence! It must be the finger of Fate."

"Or the spell of the opal!" he muttered.

She laughed. "But this time I think it's going to work for our good. You've no idea," she continued, "what terror and despair I experienced when my memory returned the other day and I realized that I married a man I do not know. I was frantic, at first, but later I decided the only thing to do was to take my medicine and not make a fuss about it. He made a violent gesture of negation.

"No, no, Cynthia! You can't go on like this. You'll want to marry. Heaven knows, I hope you will want to marry me—but at any rate, you must be freed from this adventure."

"Don't forget that I was as great, if not more, of an adventurer than he," she reminded him. "And he was a gentleman—I'm sure of that. He was thoroughly courteous and considerate."

"Nevertheless, you must be free," he argued.

"There's another side to it, too," she said gravely. "He may want to be free. Think how he must feel, tied to a girl he does not know. Why, he may be suffering far more than I. He may be wanting to marry some one he loves. You see, he promised me that he'd never try to find me or annoy me in any way. And he's kept his promise."

"He seems to have made a jolly fine profession of you," muttered Harcourt jealously.

She wrinkled her pretty brows. "I try to remember—but I can't. That part of the adventure eludes me. I don't know what he looked like, but I do remember that he seemed very gay and laughing."

"There was a long silence, while Harcourt stared frowningly into space.

"Well, what's to be done?" he asked at last.

"Would it be possible for me to meet your friends, Mrs. Lind and Mrs. Kendall? You see, I must do something."

"Your family—" he was beginning, but she cut him short.

"They've had worries enough, poor darlings. I can't tell them this latest catastrophe. No, I got myself into this impasse, now I'll have to get myself out, unaided."

"You can count on me!" he cried. "Cynthia, when it's all adjusted, as it must be, will you marry me?"

She looked at him curiously. "I don't know. I don't believe I love you. I didn't really love you that other time—when the wedding day was set. Perhaps your going away was for the best. But I may learn to love you in time; at least there's no one else."

"Not even your mysterious husband—King Carson?"

She flung back her lovely head and laughed.

"How utterly absurd! I knew him just nine hours."

"Love has been born in less time than that," he muttered.

"Impossible!" she scoffed—and didn't guess that Fate winked and made an entry for future reference!

There is Nothing new Plato Modernized

(Written for The Guardian by Helen Marshall Hunt.)

"One thing I know and that is that I know nothing." So said Socrates, one of the wisest of men. Will Durant tells us in his 'Guide to Plato' that Socrates called himself in sly modesty a philosopher—lover of wisdom—to distinguish himself from the Sophists—those who were sure of the whole truth and who, like Socrates, the seeker after truth, became very scathing in his articles on democracy after his state suffered disastrous defeat in the long-drawn out Peloponnesian War—a defeat due largely to the corruption of the democratic government of the day at Athens. He was condemned to death, a common penalty in those days for patriotism—a patriotism that dared to flout popular prejudice—to-day we ostracize in the modern sense such patriots. As one rereads the story of that period one cannot fail to see the resemblance to our own time. A devastating war, fought by Sparta, the ancient Prussia, Militaristic and autocratic in government against the naval strength of seafaring Athens, the outcome, differing from that of our Great War, brought defeat to the naval power and its domination by Sparta. But the resemblance is perhaps more apparent in the psychological effect of the two wars—in the cases that developed an intellectual challenge to the accepted theories of education, religion, government, an awakening of intellectual curiosity—curiosity that started man on his upward trend, that may lead anywhere but will not lead to death; stagnation alone brings death. One has only to look at any publishers' advertisements to see that the popular novel has a serious rival now as the best seller in the outline of philosophy, the outline of art, of science, the outline of psychology or sociology.

Just as our philosophical thinkers of to-day are responding to the demand and popularizing their ideas so did Plato in his day. Plato's Dialogues, Durant tells us, were no erudite treatise but were written that those who run might read. They are a mixture of philosophy, poetry and art, he speaks often in metaphor, marshals his pros and cons, emphasis by repetition, important arguments, just as frequently and gives us much that may serve as the very sauce and flavour by which a heavy dish of thought is made digestible for minds unused to philosophic fare.

Plato, before coming under the influence of Socrates, had been a devoted pupil he became, had been a great athlete and he entered into this game of argument with the same zeal he had shown in wrestling. He declared emphatically "I think that I was born free and not Barbarian, free man and not slave, man and not woman; but above all that I was born in the age of Socrates."

Plato had to go into exile on the death of Socrates and travelled for 12 years. He learnt that the Egyptian theology looked upon his native Greece as a child among nations, he saw many experiments in government and pondered them all in his heart. On his return to Athens he wrote his Dialogues. In the Dialogues he puts into the mouth of Socrates his own ideals on pedagogy and politics. Truly there is nothing new under the sun, this is truer than most such trite sayings—and especially so perhaps of philosophical ideas. There seem to be more of our newest theories that are not found in Plato's Republic: communism, socialism, enginism, feminism, psychoanalysis, birth control, the return to nature of Rousseau, the superman conception of Nietzsche, are discussed here. One of the priceless treasures of the world's literature, the Dialogues.

In his Utopia Plato would have real democracy, ruling as an oligarchy—or rather aristocracy—government by the best—not democracy as a right to hold office of any who can gain votes, nor of all to determine the policy of the State. Socrates says 'only the intelligent should rule and unfortunately intelligent aren't as numerous as noses.' Democracy properly defined, as we of this generation are learning, is not perfect equality of all men at birth, but an equality of opportunity through education. Every child is to have the chance to be educated, to govern in Utopia and only by careful weeding will the right ones be found. We have a specialist to doctor us when we are ill, we have a tailor make our clothes, but we think any one who can sway the crowd who are "hungry for honey" can rule the state. It is the problem of political philosophy to devise a method to debar incompetency and knavery from public office.

Plato would have the first ten years of every child's life given over AMHERST, Oct. 31.—Spurgeon Gammon of New Glasgow celebrated his return to the show ring with two first ribbons at the opening of the horse show, connected with the 2 in 1 Exposition this evening. Mr. Gammon won with a matched pair of roadsters against sharp competition, and later in a light carriage class took first with his Gelding March, against a field of nine entries. Mr. Gammon, in the days when the Maritime Horse Show was an annual spring event, was one of the leading exhibitors, but in recent years he has not taken an active part as an exhibitor. George M. Holmes, of Amherst and Horne Bros. of Winslow, P. E. I., were the two other leading winners in the light carriage classes shown during the evening while Frank Archibald of Truro took a first and second in a heavy draught class of grades for mares or Geldings, three years and upwards.

Judging in the arena will be continued on Saturday night, when the saddle class for gentlemen will be among the features. Several carriage classes will also be on tap, when an event for standard bred mares or fillies will attract general attention. One agricultural class had fourteen entries while there are seven entries for matched pairs of agriculture horses. Sheep and swine will also be judged on Saturday while the eight teams in the tug of war tournaments will settle down for their first pull tomorrow night. There was a fair attendance at the Exposition today despite the downpour of rain. The musical ride given by the Royal Dragons was numbered among the principal features of the show although an entire series of vaudeville acts held the attention of the crowd.

ADDRESS AND PRESENTATION.

very personal recollections in our minds recollections of the many pleasant associations which we formed during the years that you exercised a careful guardianship over our parish, and we must claim that the influence for good which you instilled in our hearts is still plainly evident. We hallow the memory of one who so faithfully lived the life which the Holy Priesthood enjoins, and we know that during the space which has intervened since you retired from our parish we must have shown some evidence of the salutary lessons that you imparted and that laudable example which you displayed. Many more years of happy useful work may you be spared to enjoy, and we earnestly pray that the choicest of God's blessings may be bestowed upon you. Accept of that true appreciation that animates our action today.

Dog-Collar Hats

(By British United Press.)

LONDON.—Dog collars trim some of the new hats for the Autumn. That at least is the impression given by the sturdy leather belts, studded, and fastening with ring complete, which encircle some felt hats.

The woman of extreme fashion wears exactly the same collar on a larger scale round her hat that her pet dog wears round his neck. Many of these are both made of some vivid decorative leather, the effect is most quaint, and not unpleasant.

Belts and collars are threatening to oust ribbons as hat trimmings. They encircle the ever-popular felt which, with peaks and punches is going to be worn as much as ever. The little studs make the dog-collar on the hat very attractive.

Thousands of Letters Like These Establish the Fact that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Does Relieve the Suffering of Women

Minesing, Ontario.—"I am a practical nurse and I recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to suffering women. For three months I was almost helpless and could not sit at the table long enough to drink a cup of tea. Many a time my husband carried me to bed, I would be so weak. Then he read in the paper of a woman suffering as I did who got better after taking the Vegetable Compound, so he went and got it for me. When I had taken three bottles I was just like a new woman and have had splendid health ever since. When I feel any bearing-down pains I always take it; sometimes it is my bottle or whatever I need. It is a help for me. I had very severe pains in my left side and suffered agony every month. One day when I was not able to get up my mother begged me to try your medicine.
