A HUSBAND TO MARCIA
By CAROLYN BEECHER

Chapter I.
"I won't stand it!"
How many times John Aldrich had made that remark it would be impossible to say. Yet as he reached the corner of the street where he turned to take the car he waved a good-bye to the woman standing in the window of the house he had just left, his eyes lifted as if against his will to the tear-stained face.

John Aldrich was not a namby-pamby sort of a man, yet in the months just past he had canvassed again and again all potential methods of delivering himself from his uncomfortable existence and had found them futile.

He had almost come to believe that there was no escape, that circumstances were inexorable. One is prone to think the female of the species is the one with the imprisoned soul, the one who kicks futilely against the pricking thorns, hunting a mode of escape. But just as often it is the male who lacking of moral excuse, rather the excuse of immorality, goes on and on until he reaches the breaking point.

Ten years before John Aldrich, a bright young electrical engineer, met Marcia Vane, Mrs. Brewster, an aunt of Marcia's, gave a dance. The young engineer was one of the guests. He had met Marcia once before, but so casually had the introduction been made that he had not remembered her name.

The greeting she gave him was so impersonal that it piqued him. It was as if he meant absolutely nothing to her. Being a man, John Aldrich resented this attitude. And as he was rather popular with the girls it roused his interest. It was the old story of the attraction of indifference.

John made no great effort to obtrude upon that indifference, but regarded Marcia with a sort of amusement mixed with admiration, for she was very alluring indeed in her dainty dancing gown, with her cheeks flushed and her eyes sparkling.

At twenty most girls are alluring—youth, feminine youth is then at its most captivating age to masculine youth of twenty-five. The Marcia was rather selfish, a bit spoiled by doting parents, did not appear to militate against her attractiveness. She was fascinating when her eyes flooded with tears.

Marcia had flashes of humor, of wit. She was educated, accomplished. Rather tall, slender, an ash blonde with blue eyes. Not much in that description to differentiate her from other girls of the blond type, yet she was different. She compelled people, life, to her will, even then. And it may have been just this difference that appealed to John Aldrich. He was not facile. And this quality in others had always been to him an attraction.

John's courtship was like himself, direct. To Marcia it was a novel experience. Most of the young men she knew made her feel they were in love with her without declaring themselves. But as she had said John Aldrich was not facile. Then, too, he was a home-loving man and longed for a home of his own. He wanted, as he often said to himself, to stretch his legs under his own table.

He had lived in a boarding house since leaving college, which accounts for this peculiarity. He was doing well in his business for so young a man. At least he made enough to support a wife—so he thought. He loved his profession, was ambitious, of a good family, and perhaps most in his favor with Marcia, he was very good-looking. Tall, dark, athletic, with a rather serious face lighted with a pair of laughing brown eyes. For the rest, he had the features of other men—a nose, mouth, chin—all good of their kind.

The story of his life was a simple one. The son of parents in ordinary circumstances, he had been given what they, being educated people, believed necessary—a college education. Then, as their responsibility ended when he was graduated, he had since shifted for himself, and creditably. He had one lad. He was a connoisseur and in a small way a collector of china. He loved to own it, to handle it.

Marcia was variable and subtle, as opposed to John's directness. Life had been a properly restrained affair as far as her parents could govern it for her. Just what she decided she wanted John Aldrich no one but herself knew. That she did want him was enough. And it was usual, what she wanted she took.

John Aldrich gave Marcia Vane willingly the homage she exacted. When his conscience would prick because he had neglected his business for her sake he would say to himself:

"It will be different, after we are married. Then she will be willing to see less of me and let me attend to business. We shall be always together soon." His blood leaping at the thought.

John was twenty-six, Marcia twenty-one, when they married.

ECONOMY IN GRAIN FEEDING THE DAIRY COW.

The greatest factor in the economical grain feeding of the dairy cow other than the ability of the cow to use her grain ration economically, is the supply of home grown roughages and grain feeds available on the farm. The roughages are of importance, for the richer, more succulent and more abundant they are the less grain feeding is necessary to secure the maximum milk flow from the cows. The home grown grain needs are of equal importance, for they can be grown much more cheaply than they can be purchased, the quality is known, and the greater the supply grown, the smaller the capital outlay in commercial feeds.

In growing grains on the farm to feed dairy cattle, the farmer must of necessity stick to the class of grains that will work in best with his rotation of crops. For this purpose oats can hardly be excelled and they are, as well, one of the best of grains for dairy cattle feeding. Another grain that works into a rotation very well, particularly as a nurse crop when seeding down a field, is barley. Greater use could be made of this grain in combination with oats in the dairy cow's ration. Where it is not desired to keep the various classes of grain separate, a very good yielding mixture, and a very good feeding mixture, is found in peas, oats, and barley, provided the selection of varieties is made so that they will ripen as near the same time as possible.

Farm for Sale

In the village of Murray River, containing 65 acres, 35 clear, balance covered with hard and soft wood. Large house and barn in good repair. Five minutes walk to churches, post office, school, and station.
For particulars apply Harry Bonnell, Hopfield.

they are substituted by others such as timothy hay or straw, then more of the protein-rich grains are required to retain the protein balance which, it may be well to state, will under these conditions be retained at a loss. The following grain mixture, with the above variations, will be found economical; bran 3 parts, oats 4 parts, barley 1 to 2 parts, alfalfa or cottonseed meal 2 parts, or 1 part of each.
The rate at which this mixture is fed is another factor in economical feeding. It has been found from experiments involving close calculation, that a safe rule to follow is to feed one pound of the grain mixture to every 3 pounds of milk produced in the case of fresh and especially productive cows; one pound to every 4 pounds of milk produced for the cows well on in their lactation periods, together with these naturally less productive cows, and one pound to every 5 pounds of milk produced with their lactation periods. In other words the amount fed must be arrived at by the joint action of the milk scales, the milk tester, the feed experiments involving close calculation, and the judgment of the feeder.
