Bandits Were The Surprised Ones

CLEVELAND, April 21—One bandit was shot and five captured in a gun fight between the police and a band of seven men who attempted to hold up the plant of the Inter-state Chemical Co. here today. Acting on advance information that the robbery was contemplated a squad of detectives were concealed in a closet when the bandits drove up in a motor truck and entered the Company's office with drawn revolvers. When Miss Ruth Kaminsky the book-keeper screamed at the command "hands-up" and officers sprang out. The robbers ran for the door with detectives in pursuit, the leader opening fire.

IN MEMORIAM

In memory of Mrs. Samuel Larter, died April 22nd, 1912.

The midnight stars are gleaming upon a lonely grave.
Where sleeping, but not dreaming,
Lies the one we could not save.
In dreams we see the dear sweet face,
And kiss her cold, cold brow
But in our aching hearts we know
We have no mother now.

Gone but not forgotten.
Inserted by the family.

An Adventure In Years

By CAROLYN BEECHER

Chapter XIV.

Sonia dressed with unusual care. Also she rouged her cheeks, something she seldom did. But she had an idea that Beverly would look at her paleness and be his unpleasant ironical self, the self she was beginning to hate. How he had looked her up and down when he came into her room! She thought this over and over again as she dressed. How he had absolutely covered her with his eyes, seeming to probe her very soul!

In his mind she was already an evil woman, although she knew her innocence, and knew he also knew it. But he had determined to force down her defenses, or—drive her mad. Sometimes she wondered which.

Unless this was the case, why had he so deliberately tried to throw her with Ned, the fresh unspoiled boy, who had brought to her something she never had dreamed of before—something he, her husband, never had given her and never could.

At dinner his attempted facetiousness angered her. How could he, with Ned so ill? When she said so, he changed his tactics, carefully measuring his words, each one an insult.

In a sudden blaze of anger she lost control of herself. Her words fell over each other.

"You—you—God only knows what it is you want to do!" she stormed, "what you are trying to do! What manner of man are you that, with death hanging over the house, can be as you are?"

She halted abruptly.

Beverly Strong had not spoken since she began her tirade, the sardonic smile had not left his lips, the baleful gleam his eyes.

"You are wronging me, Sonia, my dear," he said in a soft voice, the tone that invariably irritated more than when he raved—as he sometimes did. "I am very fond of the boy. But I am not fond of seeing every one look as if his illness was all there was in the world that needed consideration." He raised his voice now. "This is my house! you are my wife! I propose you shall make this house livable, that I shall have some of the comforts other married men have. I won't be shoved aside, have my comfort neglected, because that young cub in there chose to get hurt! This dinner isn't fit to eat! You know it!

Sonia did not know it because she had not eaten. Her own anger and Beverly's attitude had effectually destroyed any appetite she may have had. Now she tasted the food on her plate. Beverly was right. It was badly cooked.

"I suppose Martha was still so excited she spoiled things," she said, not apologizing but wearily, as if it made no difference. To her food seemed just now of little importance.

"She'd better spoil nothing more or out she goes!"

Sonia made no reply, yet this outburst of Beverly's would have amazed her at any other time. He never interfered in the management of the house, never seemed to be particular about his food. That it was raw nerves seeking an outlet she could not know, but it had attracted her attention, and she was surprised to notice that in his evident dislike for his food he ate heartily.

They taked little during dinner. Only the heavy-footed little maid broke stridently into the silence as she passed back and forth from dining-room to kitchen.

A heavy fog had settled down with the dusk and the warning bell sounded forlornly in the distance. The sound repeated so often made Sonia shudder. At each stroke of that mysterious bell she held her breath. Would it never stop?

"Bad night at sea," her husband volunteered.

"That bell—it drives me mad! I wish it would stop.

"Always thinking of yourself your feelings! Too much Russian in you. That bell may save many lives on such a night."

"I don't see what my being Russian has to do with my dislike of that fog bell. You are unreasonable."

"Temperament my dear Sonia, temperament! Martha doesn't mind the bell, do you Martha?" to the maid who was serving the coffee.

"Oh, no sir. I like it."

"There you see—she likes it." He turned to Sonia. "Cultivate the calm New England disposition, my dear."

A strange light had come into Sonia's eyes, a light ungovernably bright and joyous. Her head tilted a little to one side, she had all the appearance of listening to something.

She drew a long breath, almost a sigh, then said:

"Excuse me, Bevery," and rose from the table. Before he could voice his surprise she had glided from the room. She went at once to the door of Ned's room. The nurse looked up at her entrance.

"He's been calling you," she said "Your name is Sonia?"

"Yes, my name is Sonia. Go eat your dinner, nurse. I will stay with him."

"Sonia must never know—I must never let any one know," the boy muttered as she bent over him.

THIN PEOPLE NEED BITRO-PHOSPHATE

All that most weak, nervous, thin, mentally-depressed people need is ten grains of pure organic phosphate with each meal for a few weeks.

That's what the nerve specialists in London, Paris and New York are prescribing with wonderful results.

It is natural food for nerve and brain cells and is known to such reliable pharmacists as Hughes Drug Co., Ltd as Bitro-Phosphate. Because of its power to help create healthy flesh and strengthen weak nerves, much of it is being sold to people who are lacking in vitality.

CAUTION. Although Bitro-Phosphate is an excellent aid in relieving weak, nervous conditions, its use is not advised unless increased weight is desired.

Hints for the Motorists

THE VALVE MECHAN'SM

THE VALVES OF EACH GAS ENGINE CYLINDER, through which the charge of fuel and air is drawn in from the carburetor, on the intake stroke and that trough which the burned gases are expelled during the exhaust stroke, respectively known as the inlet and exhaustvalves, must afford as free passage for the gases as possible and must therefore be of large size, must open as widely as practicable and shut tightly when in the closed condition. On account of the high speeds at which engines are operated, the valves must open as quickly as possible and close with equal promptness and they must both open and close at exactly the correct period in the cycle of operations of the cylinder, Since both of them, but especially the exhaust valve are exposed to burning gases, they must be cooled by water-jacketing to prevent burning and warping of their surfaces. The accompanying diagram represents a vertical cross-wise section, taken through one valve and valve-operating mechanism of an L-type cylinder, having a detachable head. In this construction both valves and their operating gear are indentical and located close together on the same side of the cylinder. The valve here shown is assumed to be the inlet valve. The cylinder head is not shown. A represents a portion of the cylinder bore space, B the inlet valve chamber space, the intake manifold being connected at C. The space represented by D would be clearance space or a part of the compression chamber, if the cylinder head were in place. E is a cross section of a part of the crankcase, but all cross sectioned structural parts above this are cast integrally with the cylinder block, such as the cylinder wall F, the ringshaped beveled valve-seat G, the valve stem, guide H and water jacke, walls J. Water jacket spaces are shown in cross section at K. At L is shown the circular, beveled head of the valce itself, closed upon the correspondingly beveled valve seat G, while M is the stem of the valve, fitted in the guide H and capable of sliding freely therein. The valve and stem are usually a single piece, the head at least being of heat resisting material, with its face ground into perfect contract with the seat, the large gas passage for a small rise of the beveled form of valve face and seat being adopted in order to afford a represented as closed upon its seat, thus entirely obstructing the gas pasaage from C and B into D and A, but the arrows show the flow of gas surronding stem M and compressed between the lower end of guide H and the cup shaped washer O, which is held on the valve stem by pin P, presses valve head L strongly against its seat and normally keeps it closed. Into a hole bored through the cylinder flange R and upper crankcast wall E, is fitted the pushrod guide S, usually held in position by a clamp (not shown) and, in vertical cylindrical hole, bored thertin, is fitted the pushrod T, free to slide up and down. The roller U is fixed in the bottom of T and is free to rotate, but T is prevented from turning in S by a groove in the latter which is a loose fit for the width of the roller. Pushrod T is bored out and threaded to receive the adjusting screw X, which is locked by a check nut. The adjustment is made so that, when the valve is seated and the pushrod fully down, there shall be a slight clearance between X and the lower end of stem M. V is a cross section of the cam shaft, which is rigidly supported in bearings within the crank-case and is the cam W, with its surface always in contact with roller U. As the cam shaft and cam turn, as indicated by the arrow the projecting portion of the cam is passing over roller U. As soon as this flat portion has passed and the sloping face of the cam reaches U, spring N acts to push the valve and pushrod down the former is fully closed when the circular part of the cam comes into contract with U. The cover plate Y encloses the valve parts.

Final Choice For Big Fight

Tex Rickard Decides on Jersey City for Carpentier-Dempsey Battle July 2

NEW YORK, April 20.—The Dempsey-Carpentier heavyweight championship bout will be fought in Jersey City on Saturday, July 2.

This announcement was made by Promoter Tex Richard here today. Rickard said he has not made final choice of the actual site in Jersey City. Three different sites are under consideration all of which offer excellent transportation facilities.

Rickard said that while both Newark and Atlantic City offered favorable sites, the hearty co-operation of the Jersey City authorities and Chamber of Commerce, as well as proximity to New York, were factors which lead to the final choice.
