Married Quarters

By DAVID LYALL

Continued

"Not ten minutes ago, by the afternoon post. Have you just come from home, Isaac?"

"No, I've been to one or two places—the bank and Tom's. I daresay there'll be letters at home, too since you've got one. What does she say?"

Naomi smiled a little fluttering smile.

"Just a few lines, very sweet, saying she is looking forward to getting to know Aunt Naomi, and that I am not to be angry because she has taken away Jim. There it is! Dear me, what a world it is for things happening in nowadays, to be sure!"

Once more Bradford requisitioned the spectacles, and ran his eyes over the few lines which Poppy, in a very ecstatic mood, had indited to Naomi Bradford. They did not make much appeal to the hard head and somewhat sterner intelligence of Isaac Bradford.

"Humph, not much in that! It's a queer business altogether, but I suppose explains some things about Jim we haven't got the grip of just lately. It wasn't exactly his wounds or his future that were worrying him, eh, what, Naomi? I suppose he told you, as he told Tom. Everybody seems to know what was going to happen excepting his own father and mother that had the reet to know."

"Did he really tell Tom Bishop? I had heard nothing, Isaac, until this moment, though I felt, of course, that there was something worrying Jim. Never mind! All's well that ends well. Next thing he'll be bringing her here. What an excitement for Susan and Rhoda!"

"There's something not reet about it, Naomi and I'm not easy in mind," said Bradford, rising somewhat heavily to his feet. "I'll have to go home and see whether they've heard it there. Susan will be proper mad if everybody's heard but her that's been such a proper mother to them. Tell you what, Naomi! I'm not sure whether you haven't chosen the better part after all. You dwell very snug and comfortable here, and haven't got the worries of a family."

Naomi merely smiled, patted his arm and let him go. She shared his forebodings to the full, but it was never her part in life to discourage hope or promote dispeace. She was pleased at having received the letter, because it was a tangible proof that Jim had been telling his new wife all about his home folks. Further than that Naomi did not seek to go at the moment. Everything must now depend on the girl herself.

Isaac Bradford was conscious of a slow reluctance in his steps as he approached his own door. When he entered the shop and found it in sole charge of the two young assistants he understood that the bomb had fallen there too.

"Where's Miss Rhoda, eh?" "Gone upstairs, sir. Mrs. Bradford fetched her mighty quick, sir. Something to do with the post."

Bradford's rumbled and went through the back entrance, and up the outside stair to the house.

The moment his heavy foot trod the inner passage his wife came flying out, very red in the face obviously excited, and with tearful eyes.

"Oh, father, wherever have you been?" she asked, fretfully. "Thought you'd never be coming back no more. It's a disappearing family this is now, most of the time. There's great news by the post. Jim's a married man, father, and at Eastbourne for his honeymoon. Here's his letter, and one from his wife, too! Did ye ever hear the like, and is that a way to treat honest folks?"

She was disappointed at the effect of her announcement. He threw his arm around her shoulders, and walked her back to the sitting-room, where Rhoda was simply devouring the joint epistle that had come in by the afternoon post.

"You don't look a bit surprised, dad," she said, drolly. "Has anybody been telling you?"

"Well, as a matter of fact, they have. I've been at Naomi's she had a letter, too; and Tom Bishop showed me the announcement of the marriage in The Times."

"Has Tom been keeping it to himself all this time?" asked Rhoda, sourly. "Just like Tom Bishop, of course!"

anxious here. Well, mother, so you've a new daughter, eh?"

"A son's a son till he gets him a wife," and it won't be an easy job gettin' to know a perfect stranger. More especially as he never so much as told us he knew her. Jane Cotman would have been easier," said Mrs. Bradford, reflectively.

Rhoda put back her head at that and laughed hardy.

"Mother, I wish Jim could hear you. He loathes Jane Cotman. Didn't you see him glare at her the night they were all here at tea?"

"Glare? Why should he glare? Jane's a very good girl and a clever girl, too. She makes the best bread in Markyate, for I've eaten it myself and wondered where she got the light touch."

"I shouldn't think this one would be a bread-maker," said Rhoda, musingly. "I wonder where he picked her up?"

"She's somebody big," said Isaac Bradford slowly. "She's the daughter of the Hon. and Reverend Pomeroy, of Cudham Abbey in Norfolk."

"My hat!" said Rhoda, who, though not given to slang, had some workable knowledge of it. "An Honourable. That'll make Markyate folks sit up. She'll be too grand for us, mother. There'll be no need to get the spare bedroom turned out for her. She won't sample it."

Mrs. Bradford was thinking out a suitable reply when Rhoda's quick ear caught the rumble of a motor stopping at the door.

She flew to the window, and, heedless of the effect on the street, thrust her head out.

"Mercy me, they've arrived, mother! Yes, there's Jim, and there are stacks of luggage, mountains high, on the car."

Nobody moved to the door. It was as if a kind of paralysis had suddenly descended on a hitherto active family.

Mrs. Bradford was the first to recover herself, and bawling the fact that she was not properly dressed for the occasion, waddled out to the door. She reached it at the moment when her son, gently guiding his young wife's steps, arrived at the top of the stairs.

"There you are, mother! This ridiculous child would persist that because nobody was at the station you were all angry. You got my telegram, of course, and it's quite all right?"

"We got no telegram, lad," answered Mrs. Bradford, her eyes positively gleaming to the young creature by his side.

The Leader For Canada!

Highlights in the Montreal Speech of Hon. R. B. Bennett, leader of the Conservative party:

EMIGRATION TO UNITED STATES—"There are some things a government may not and cannot do, there are some things over which a government has no control, but there are other matters that profoundly affect the life of a nation which a government should and must do, and their failure to do it constitutes neglect on their part of the interests of the country they govern. . . . The charge I prefer against the King Government is that they failed to recognize and realize that the first duty of the Canadian Government is to provide employment for Canadians in Canada."

UNEMPLOYMENT—"Why is it? The reason is that, instead of making here what we could make in this country by utilizing Canadian energy, brains and money, we have sent out capital abroad to buy goods from other countries and give employment accordingly. . . . What shall we do? Just as certainly as I stand here, if we are returned to power on the night of July 28, we propose at the first session of Parliament to amend the fiscal laws so as to give Canadians an equal opportunity in the development of their country under fair competition with their competitors elsewhere in the world. My business and the business of those with whom I may be associated is to see that Canadians are my first consideration."

U. S. TARIFF LEGISLATION—"We are not concerned about legislation against any other country, but for one country, and that country is Canada. We of our party will see to it that no country makes the Canadian tariff except Canada."

BRITISH PREFERENCE—"Let us admit the statement of Mr. King and of Mr. Dunning, that the preference will make Britain more prosperous, and of greater purchasing power. But did Mr. King or Mr. Dunning make any provision to insure that Britain would spend the money in Canada?"

OLD AGE PENSIONS—"We say that if the federal Government can provide one-half of the old age pensions, it can provide the whole without wrecking the constitution."

IMPERIALISM—"I, like yourselves, am proud of this country as part of the British Empire, because that Empire respects and protects the rights of minorities, their tongue, their religion, their traditions. But my first duty is to that part of the Empire which is called Canada."

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE REPRESENTATIVES—"Nobody knows better than Premier King that, in our constitutional practice, no one can indicate in advance the names of those who would be called upon to serve in the Cabinet, as they have first to be submitted to the representative of the Crown."

CONSERVATIVE POLICY—"To safeguard Canadian agriculture, Canadian industry, Canadian labor, Canadian health, and to safeguard the Canadian consumer against exploitation."

ISSUE OF JULY 28—"Are we to give a renewed mandate to a Government to increase the money to be sent abroad to buy products which we require for our own support and sustenance; or shall we, by developing Canadian industry and agriculture, offer the opportunity to Canadian farmers and Canadian workmen in Canada to find that employment which is necessary for the development of this country?"
