MILLIE DECIDES

Chapter 46
"You're not going back to be a nurse to that old woman?" Mrs. Parker voiced the first objection. "Think of that, a girl who's had your advantages and your education, and the position in this town that you've had, being a nurse?" Patty waited for an opportunity to answer.

"I wasn't a nurse," she said. "A maid then."
"Not that. You know her maid travelled with her. I was only a well-a-companion. And even so, what if I had been a nurse?"
"There was enough talk Mrs. Werner sitting over there eating my own chicken patties and ice cream and asking insinuating questions as to what you were doing while you were away!"
"But Mother, what of it. We may have been rich for this town, but I weren't really well-to-do, and if I ever wanted to go away for a long trip I would have to pay the cost of it. Besides we are poor now. Something has to be done. You know that."

"It's all his fault, wasting time heading trashes like most strenuous women to earn his way, breaking stones along newly made roads, telling trees in the forest, working in some deep mine."
"It doesn't matter whose fault it is, it's his money that's up for grabs. Doing the most strenuous work to earn his way, breaking stones along newly made roads, telling trees in the forest, working in some deep mine."
"I don't see that that helps us, Millie," he said. "Then, selfishly, 'What would I do with you away, Patty? You've been a brick all the way through.'"
"If I go to Mrs. Mann, she'll pay me $25 a week and I'll live at her place. I'll have few expenses. I can send you $15 or $20 every week."

But her mind was busy with the problem of that girl which seemed to be between herself and Paul. In Mrs. Mann's house, she would be a dependent. However, Mrs. Mann herself was about it, that would be the attitude of Mrs. Mann's little world. And Paul thought to that world!
The other idea tempted her, to be secretary in a woman's club, but it was less money, and she would have to board somewhere, could she have one room over her own place to board home?
Would she go to New York? Probably not, she decided. If she did, he would see her only as a secretary, or companion to his mother's friend. Still, she thought of being that much nearer to him, there was a certain exhilaration, living in the same city with him. It was argued back and forth. But the need of money was too strong a fact of metropolitan life, and they consented to Patty's departure.

"But I don't want to think of my laughter as being any sort of 'upper servant' Mrs. Parker said. And Patty smiled, thinking of the snobbishness that flourishes as strongly in the small as in the large city. She was so free from this feeling, as a sure of her own position in the world, that she never felt called upon to defend it nor to question it.
So the news went about that Patty was going to New York. The local papers, the newspaper, the "One of the distinguished members of our younger set and a leader in the social activities" of the Country Club has been called to a position of trust in New York, to which centre of metropolitan interests she will shortly depart. Many social functions are planned prior to her departure. Among them are:
And all we duly recorded, even the "luncheon party" which Cora gave and which consisted of four children. Cora, Cora's mother, Maudie and favors left from a last year's anniversary party.
Millie's restlessness increased daily. That summer was an unusually hot one, and Millie fretted because the black clothes she affected were so heating.
One day she went downtown without saying a word. That evening at dinner, two red spots on her cheeks showed that she was excited and happy.
"What a business woman too," she exclaimed. "If this town think I'm going to settle down to run a boarding house, it's going to get a awful jolt!"
"What have you done?" Mrs. Parker asked, admiring her for it beforehand.
"I've sold the house, that's what!"
She looked about triumphantly, as if at the sensation she created at the table.
"So we're going to the city too," she finished, her head up triumphantly, and her sharp little chin thrust out.

TO THE POULTRYMAN:

A Weekly Letter Containing Practical Pointers in the Management and Care of Standard Bred Poultry, Taken From the Daily Log Book of Sunny Crest Poultry Farm, Bear River, P. E. I. by the Manager.

At the close of last week's article I promised to go into that ever interesting subject of the amount of feed consumed by a heavy producing pen of egg type (Leghorns) fowls as compared with the amount required to maintain a flock of the general purpose type (barred rocks) under the same conditions, with a view to ascertaining just how this is going to effect the years net earnings of the two breeds.
Feeding is a subject on which there is always bound to be a diversity of opinion, and you will find that no matter how willing a poultryman is to discuss the various phases of the business and the results obtained by what he considers the best methods, it is worthy of note how man committed he becomes when the question of feeding is up for debate.
It will probably be more convincing to the reader if I give some figures taken from the various egg laying contests throughout the country conducted by expert individual stations and agricultural colleges, for while conditions under which each one is conducted will be more or less different, it will give a pretty good general idea of the amounts consumed by the different breeds and, at a late date I will touch briefly on the results obtained at those points.
Very few of these reports mention the amounts of green food given as very often reports are made from two flocks, one in confinement and the other on range, and in order to make the comparison of any value, it is understood that the hens in confinement receive as much green food as they will consume, or at least as much as they require to balance the grain ration.
In a recent test at the Ohio Experimental Station with two flocks of Leghorns, the average weight of the hens being about three and a half pounds, the consumption ran about sixty pounds per bird of which 37.2 was grain and 22.1 (pounds) mash. In addition to this they had five pounds clover chaff and the mash contained percentage of grit, shell, and charcoal.
In the same test with a flock of fifty barred Plymouth Rocks kept under practically the same conditions and the average weight of the hens being about three and three quarter pounds, they consumed about 55.44 pounds of feed, the average of whole grain feed being smaller than for the Leghorns.
At the Purdue Experiment Station the average consumption of White Plymouth Rocks was 55.75 pounds of grain and mash, 8.55 pounds of meat scrap, the whole grain being about three fifths of the whole ration, in a similar experiment with White Leghorns the consumption of grain and mash ranged from fifty-six to sixty-six pounds per year.
The report of the Storrs Laying contest gives the consumption of feed for the various breeds as follows: "During that time of the year that a hen has a considerable amount of range from which she can scrape a part of her daily ration, the question of amounts to feed is not of such importance but for fowls closely confined at all times the quantity of feed becomes a very important one. I am therefore suggesting a few samples of amounts which have been used with excellent results in various localities throughout Canada where I have been personally connected with experiments made, the amounts given will be taken as applying to (a) flock of 32 Leghorns or (b) flock of 25 B. P. Rocks or (c) 22 Brahmas or their equivalent, all adults, all females laying."
The writer goes on to outline several ration but the above is about all that we require for the two types under the same conditions.

On this farm, the Leghorn pullets which are kept for egg production alone, are fed a good building ration from the time they are brought into the laying house until they start to produce; and as the percentage of production increases the ration is made more concentrated, always keeping a strict eye to the condition of the birds and watching out for a falling off in weight. When they are all in good health and the egg yield is running pretty even we will start and feed with a view to keeping them with a full crop throughout the day but never sluggish or inclined to stand around and mope. We find that this system together with an average daily consumption of twenty-two pounds of feed per one hundred Leghorns in the proportion of two pounds of mash to one pound of whole grain will give the best results, and with slight adjustments either a little more or less as the condition of the birds and the egg yield demands we find this a good way to arrive at a safe standard for best results in amount required to maintain a flock of B. P. Rocks, for by adding about from 25 per cent to 35 per cent to the amount under which the Leghorns do best, we get maximum results from the heavier breed.
From the foregoing I think we are safe in saying that it will take at least one ounce more feed per day to feed a general purpose fowl than to feed a Leghorn and as a hen can be kept for two years as against one for the general purpose, it will be readily seen that the bill for the heavier type will run from $1.25 to $2.00 more than that of the Leghorn and the only thing we have to offset this additional expense is that when the heavier bird has ended her usefulness as a layer her carcass is worth more to market.
As a very liberal estimate we will say that the general purpose fowls will weigh seven pounds when she is marketed and at the usual prices offered will realize about $1.20 while the Leghorn will weigh from four and a half to five pounds and realize around $5c.
The next item of comparison will be the egg production of the two types around which all the others revolve. Can the heavier breeds produce as many or more eggs than the purely egg type under any conditions? Next week we will have some interesting figures in this connection.
If your pullets are well enough nurtured to lay but are not producing it is a pretty safe bet that they are not being well enough fed. In all probability they are still putting on weight for which they require feed, also additional fat, forming feed to keep them warm during the coldest weather. This together with the amount they ordinarily require for egg production makes pretty liberal consumption of food necessary.
Try to make the increase in the form of mash, as that is where the shortage is most liable to be. If they are inclined to pick it over and waste a good deal make it more palatable, cut out some of the bran and add a little more cornmeal or white middlings, perhaps it will stand more meat scrap. Up to twenty percent is quite safe in the dry mash.
Charity always goes farther than it is sent.
It's impossible to buy a friend that is worth the price.
