

When Appetite Fails

When you have no appetite for wholesome food, when even the most delicate morsels fail to tempt—look out!

You are probably suffering from nervous indigestion—caused by nerve strain, worry or overwork—often the forerunner of serious ills.

Fellows' Syrup is the world's leading tonic for the nervous system. It aids digestion, builds tissue, and will give you an appetite, strength for a full day's work, and zest for the evening's pleasure.

Fellows' Laxative Tablets are specially prepared for the rational treatment of, and ultimate recovery from constipation.

The Third Warning

A Mystery Love Story

By Augustus Mink

"Rubbish, Jessie," I laughed. "A London chef couldn't do us better."
"Ye're easier to do for nor the auld laird," sighed Jessie with pleasure. "So I'll keep the cottage aired and have both your beds ready."

"That's right. We may be back any day. By the way, how is Mr. Seymore? I haven't seen him for a day or so. He's not away again?"
"No, no," replied Jessie. "He was out this morning pent-pent away. He's aye at the pentings."

A whimsical notion entered my mind. Unless I was mistaken George's wire meant that something had happened, and the news must be good or he wouldn't be dragging me away from Brackenbridge. In short we were now one up on Seymore. "Jessie," I said, "tell Mr. Seymore that I send him my kindest regards!"

A LAME GOOD-BY

And hoping he could appropriate the satire, I left her to perform her various duties and pre-are supper; and I strolled in the direction of the Manse to bid Marget an revoir.

Marget's face, when she ran out to meet me in the hall, told me all I wanted to know, as far as news of her father went. The hall lamp was dim, but there was light enough to see trouble in her lovely eyes. I knew as well as if she had told me pointblank that no word had yet reached her and that she was dreadfully distressed.

"I'm so glad you've come," she said in a low agitated voice—"so glad."

Then I smelled tobacco smoke.

"But you've got a visitor!" I whispered. "Then I'll clear out. I can come back shortly."

"No, no," she said, clutching my arm. "You must not go—you must not."

"I don't want to intrude," I explained. "I don't mind coming later—"

"But you don't understand—I want you to stay!" Her voice was excited, and there was pleading note in it that I could not ignore.

"Why, of course then I'll stay if you say so. But tell me what's the trouble—"

"I'll explain later," she whispered. "Don't say any more just now. . . . Just come right in, Mr. Drysdale," she added in louder tones, and she led me down the passage into her father's study.

There sat Mr. Seymore in front of a crisp fire, a cigar in his hand, and his head comfortably back in an arm-chair. The smile that leaped readily to his face when he caught sight of me was a fraction of a second too late. I had observed, in the scowl which it replaced, his real feelings about my intrusion.

"Ah, my dear Drysdale!" he cried affably. "Come in, my dear fellow." He waved to a chair. His familiar tones and his assumption of the part of host sent an ugly tingle down my spine. I felt for the first time that he was definitely inimical toward me; and implicit behind that pleasant mask of a smile I was conscious of a smoldering antagonism.

"I didn't know you were such a frequent visitor at the Manse," he said half-banteringly.

"I'm not," I replied. "I haven't been here for a couple of days."

"Why shouldn't he come here?" said Marget, with a brightness which she obviously didn't feel. "Are you suggesting there should be a chaperon when dad's away?"

"May I offer my services?" said Seymore blandly. "I would make an excellent one."

"Pooh!" I said. "I only came to— and then I stopped. To admit that I had come to see if there was any news of Mr. Shaw would be giving away the fact that George and I suspected there was something unusual about Shaw's absence. "I only came to say good-by," I concluded lamely.

"Good-by," cried Marget. "What- ever do you mean?"

AN ATTACK

"I travel to London tonight," I replied, and looked Seymore in the eyes. If I expected him to blink, I was mistaken. I hoped that the news might convey to him that events had moved quicker than he expected, and that there was no longer any reason why I should remain at Brackenbridge. But his features showed nothing but a mild and polite surprise.

"This is very sudden," he remarked.

Well, he wouldn't catch me with that, for I was ready with an answer.

"Oh, I don't know that it's so very sudden. I'm joining my friend Collier. "Put that in your pipe and smoke it," I added inwardly, "and even if you do know George's address I'll do you no good, for he's not staying at his flat." I said it inwardly, but my face must have shown the flicker of a smile, for he remarked: "Well, you seem bucked about the projected visit anyway."

"I am rather," I said airily. "Of course I've enjoyed being at Brackenbridge, and I'm coming back again to enjoy it more."

"How soon?" came quickly from Marget.

"Perhaps not more than a few days. At any rate, I hope not. Collier and I have some business to transact. I should be rather jolly in London again."

"I hope to be there one of these days soon," said Seymore casually, as he rose to go. "We may meet."

"Rather," I agreed. "I believe you have my card with my London address, or you can get it from Jessie. Drop me a card when you're coming."

"We may meet quite soon then," said Seymore, smiling.

"I hope so," I returned. "Soon as you like!"

"Good-night, Drysdale. What if I forget the card eh? May I just drop in?"

"I'll be ready for you any time you like," I said, looking at him square in the face. And I thought: "If that's not plain speaking, my friend, you must be deaf."

"Good-night," I added aloud. He smiled again and was gone.

Marget was back from the front door in an instant.

"Are you really going away?" she demanded eagerly.

She was close beside me and I could see a helpless expression in her eyes. "I hate to go away from you, Marget," I said with feeling; "but I've got to, this time."

She looked at me fixedly. For a moment I thought she was resenting the warmth of my tone, for I meant every word of it, and I am afraid I was looking at her in a way that was not exactly frigid.

SPRAINS PAINFUL JOINTS

Side, Back, Arms

Ached All Night

GODERICH, Ont. From her home on Bennett Street comes word of the wonderful results Nerviline achieved in Mrs. Lavery's case. She suffered from shooting pains in the side, arms and back. These muscular pains caused intense distress. Ordinary measures failed. Then Nerviline was applied. It penetrated quickly. Its pain-relieving influence quickly brought ease and comfort. All pain disappeared—recovery was complete. This all goes to prove what a powerful liniment Nerviline is.

The Imported Registered

Clydesdale Stallion Craigenflower

25395—21194

will stand for service at the Agricultural Hall, Charlottetown, for the season of 1930.

This big, stylish, brown horse has the quality, substance bone and action necessary in a high class sire.

At the Ottawa Show, shortly after an ocean voyage, Craigenflower stood next to Lascelles, the grand champion at the Canadian National Exhibition, 1929. Expert horse judges pronounce him one of the best stallions in Canada.

This splendid stallion, sired by the popular Auchenflower (12007) and out of a dam by the World famous Baron of Buchlyvie (9958) proved a successful sire in Scotland where he commanded a wide patronage at fee of $25.00.

The breeding and quality of this horse is of the very choicest, and owners of mares should give him an inspection before breeding.

Terms $12.00 cash or $15.00 on approved notes due November 15th, 1930.
