vance the welfare of humanity. The league was born in a very stormy world. There were good and evil fairies. It was buffeted by antagonism, suspicions, jealousy, phantoms fears. It is almost a miracle that it has survived. Many times it has been slain in the press, or a part of the press, in many countries. "I do not desire to dwell on the great achievements of the league. They have been remarkable. I do not speak of them except to allude to the wonderful organization at Geneva. It has been built up in a way which I do not think that any nation has any machinery comparable to that of Geneva which would enable it to equal the work. "I venture to submit that the covenant is the most effectual and powerful assurance for peace and international justice that man has yet devised.

"Not upon its concrete achievements rests the firmest hope of the League as I conceive it. Not by force can the peace of the world be maintained; that would be a contradiction of terms. Not by treaties alone which are idle unless behind them are the ideal, and the spirit upon which the enthronement of public right can be established. Consider the violation of international engagements during the present century. I beg you to inquire and conclude how far our era has attached to solemn treaties the sanctity with which they were regarded 20 centuries ago. "What hope is there for the future outlawry of war? It must be born and nurtured in a spiritual atmosphere. There must be the education of world-wide opinion. Nations must be educated in the practice and habit of peace. "I have spoken of the Washington disarmament conference, and I wish to say how grateful the world should be for the idea which inspired that gathering.

parting kiss, although just as tender and affectionate as in the past, had seemed a little hurried as if he had wanted to run away from something. And there was the alarmed, almost guilty look that had come into his face when she mentioned the mysterious Mr. Graves. "Something must be wrong! In a sober mood she went to her room, rang for her maid and dressed. Within the space of half an hour life seemed to have taken on a graver tone. It seemed as if an epoch had run its course between grapefruit and the final sip of coffee. Until now there had been little of a serious nature in her life. The death of her mother had been a sad affliction, but it had come so early in her life that it was now but a pale memory.

Then there had been a private preparatory school on the Hudson, and then college. There had been the usual gay affairs, the usual light flirtations, the usual youthful pranks and frolics. Life had smiled on her, and she had smiled brightly back. Now, in a twinkling, all was changed. Ever since her childhood a rare intimacy had existed between her father and herself. Even in the midst of studies and amusements she had always looked upon her father as the dearest, noblest, most wonderful man in the world. A strong and simple affection for him had followed her from childhood through early and rampant youth.

Now he was in trouble of some sort, and it seemed all the graver by reason of the secrecy he maintained. It was the first time within her recollection that he had failed to confide in her. There was something disturbing, almost sinister, in his silence on this occasion. While the maid combed and brushed her blue-black hair, a question came back to her time and again: Who was the mysterious Mr. Graves? A suspicion engendered by her father's evasions would not leave her mind. She tried not to think of it; it was too harrowing. And yet—she shrugged her slight, shapely shoulders. After all, she knew nothing definite. She was rearing a structure of ugly surmises on a few symptoms of nervousness and abstraction on her father's part. Her fears seemed a little fantastic when she viewed them in the light of reason. Virgil Ellsworth Castle was above suspicion. Everybody was willing to admit that. Probably it was as he had said, that he had been working too hard of late.

Her fears were almost gone when the maid left the room. She stood at the window looking out over the park that sparkled in its autumnal draperies. There was a fresh, colorful charm about the life outside. She couldn't resist the spell of it. Her heart grew lighter, her young blood coursed a little faster. The shadows were momentarily gone.

MISS CONWAY

The stiff-backed manservant appeared at the door. "The lady is still waiting, miss." Adele started a little. She had quite forgotten the woman from Carter's. "I'll see her at once, Wambley," she told the servant, and even as she spoke she thought it a little strange that Wambley, with his inbred and rather absurd sense of class distinction, should have referred to the caller as a "lady."

Soon, however, the visitor was ushered in, and this little incongruity was explained. Instead of the person she had expected there entered a woman of thirty or so, fastidiously garbed and strikingly handsome. She gave Adele a quick look of appraisal softened by a faint smile. "Miss Castle," she said briskly, yet with an engaging manner, "I have come to tell you something unpleasant. Shall I broach the painful subject gently and easily, or shall I plunge into it at once?" "I think I should prefer the plunge," said Adele bewilderedly. "Good! That will save time. Miss Castle, your father is in trouble."

Adele winced. The speaker's subdued tone and the friendly shading of her voice failed to temper the bluntness of her statement. "I don't understand you," she said a little coldly.

The woman's eyes of light green scrutinized her. They were shrewd, farseeing eyes with a glint of amusement in them. "That's unfortunate," she murmured in a tone that conveyed the faintest hint of doubt. "Explanations are such awkward things. Won't you accept me on faith and believe me when I tell you that your father is in desperate difficulties and that something must be done at once?"

Adele's thoughts went back to the scene at the breakfast table. The woman's statement, terse and inexplicit though it was, coincided with the fears that had taken shape in her mind during her talk with her father. "Won't you tell me who your are?" she asked.

"My name is Miss Conway. Please don't ask me to identify myself further. I am quite unimportant my only mission here is to take you to the house of a gentleman who will give you all the details and suggest how your father may escape from his troubles."

"Who is the gentleman?" asked Adele guardedly. "Doctor Moffett."

"I have never heard of him. Why does he wish to help my father?" "That's a natural question. If I were trying to deceive you, which I am not, I should tell you that Dr. Moffett is a kindly and altruistic soul who derives his pleasure in life by doing good to other people. That's not quite the case."

The statement had a persuasive effect on Adele. She saw that Miss Conway was a clever and fascinating woman, one who would not waste breath on useless lies. "What is his object, then?" "It's a selfish one. Dr. Moffett is ready to suggest an arrangement that will benefit himself and, incidentally, help your father. That's the whole unvarnished truth." She wriggled a blushing solitaire on her finger. "My car is waiting. Will you come?"

Adele passed to the window and looked down. She saw a fine car with graceful streamer lines and a chauffeur at the wheel. It was quite a prepossessing sight, one that seemed to disarm all suspicions in advance. She turned to Miss Conway and surprised a smile that caused her eyes to contract for an instant. "I'll be ready in a moment," she declared.

She ran into the library, closed the door and called the Manhattan Club on the telephone. She told the attendant that she wished to speak to Mr. Paul Ainsworth. After a brief wait she heard Paul's bored and drawing voice on the wire. "Dear," she said in a subdued tone, "with a cautious glance at the door. "This is Adele. Will you do something for me?"

"If it's an engagement for an afternoon tea—" began Paul cautiously and with distaste. "It isn't. Listen and don't interrupt. There's a Chippenwattle sedan outside our house. In ten minutes I shall step in and drive away accompanied by a very charming and mysterious lady. You would adore her. Paul—you dear idiot! When we start, you are to follow discreetly in a taxi. The emphasis is on discreetly. We shall probably drive to somebody's house somewhere. If I fall to come out—no interruptions, please! If I fall to come out within half an hour, you know what to do. That's all. Hop to it!"

With an excited laugh she closed the connection on Paul's remonstrances, then ran to another room and changed into a smart street dress. The selection of a hat took a

Is Your Wife Your Business Manager?

IF YOU can answer "yes" to that question, you are fortunate. But if you cannot answer "yes", you ought to spend three or four evenings thinking over your family's financial position in the event of your death. Then you should write instructions for your wife to follow regarding the conduct of the family's affairs should necessity compel her to assume the burden.

When you have discovered what a task it is to write out instructions, think how much greater a task it will be to follow them. One of the first questions will be, "Where is the money coming from to keep the family going?" The answer is "from Life Insurance."

"Good old Paul!" she sighed. Then, with her most guileless and To Be Continued Tomorrow
