John Gresham's Girl
By Concordia Merrel

"I knew there would be a storm," she whispered, glad to talk, and trying to talk steadily. "The last few days have been so terribly hot and stuffy; so a relief. Oh, Jim I'm so glad you are here! . . . What should I have done without you? All alone . . . with all that awfulness going on . . . Do you think I'm an utter little idiot?"

"No, Lucy. No. Just . . . rather a little girl, that's all . . ." He was whispering, too, and the words were breaking from his lips jerkily.

"I try not to be, but . . . Oh, Jim!" That was a cry as the room was lit up with vivid blue that left it black when it had streaked through.

"It's going over," he assured her. "The thunder didn't follow nearly so quickly that time . . ."

She sat quite still, clinging close giving herself to the lovely comfort of his arms, listening to his kind, soothing words, until the storm rolled away into the distance. Then came the snapping of the tension. His arms dropped from around her, and she lay back, rather limp, into her pillows. There was a considerable silence. Then:

"Thank you, Jim, dear," she said softly.

He rose from the edge of the bed quickly, at that, and moved over towards his own room.

"You can be the most wonderful dear, when it pleases you to be," she added softly, her eyes following him; but he went straight on, without turning and without a word.

"But, Jim, you laughed at my fright," she went on, "Wasn't that rather a dangerous thing to do?"

"Dangerous?" He flung the word questioning, over his shoulder.

"Yes, because I might retaliate by laughing at some of your fears . . ."

He was at the door now, and with a hand on the knob, he turned.

"My fears?" he said, in the same questioning way, rather as if he were trying to gain time.

"Don't pretend you haven't any, though a thunderstorm doesn't happen to be among them." Her big blue eyes looked across at him from between the shining gold of two long braids of hair over her shoulders, with a rather bewildering fondness in their depths. His hand tightened around the door-knob as he met that look.

He did not speak; would not, perhaps; or, perhaps, dared not.

He did not speak; would not, perhaps; or, perhaps, dared not.

"I know one or two things you have been afraid of, Jim, dear . . . You have been afraid of Oliver . . ."

He bit his lip, but still would not speak . . . "And I know something that you are afraid of now; all the time; at this very minute . . ."

"God! So do I!" The words broke from him.

"Something much littler than a thunderstorm . . ." she went on. "Jim, you're afraid of me . . . Afraid of loving me . . . Aren't you, Jim?"

"Lucy!" Her name rang through the room on a note of sheer torture, and left the silence ringing with it. He stood for a moment, while some battle raged itself out within him . . . Then flung open the door and looked at her.

She lay looking at the door he had closed rather sharply behind him, half-smiling as she looked. Then raised a hand and turned out the light.

She scarcely slept at all after that, until it was almost day. Then she fell into such a profound sleep that she did not wake again till past ten. She woke then, slowly, half smiling, and with Jim's name on her lips, as if the memory of his protecting arms around her had been with her through her dreams.

When she had dressed she went into the sitting room, and there she found him apparently waiting for her. He was standing by the window, looking out. The table was set all ready for breakfast.

He turned as she came in, and for a moment they stood looking at each other. She didn't know what to say, and wondered what his mood was to be this morning, after what had happened last night. One thing his mood most definitely was not; it was not helpful. For he said nothing, only stood and looked at her. She took refuge in the strictly conventional.

"Good-morning, Jim."

He was conventional, too.

"Good-morning, Lucy."

She glanced round the room, a little nervously; at the table, then back at him.

"Not had breakfast yet?" she asked.

"I was waiting for you," he told her.

"That was . . . friendly . . . of you," she said. "Do you . . . feel friendly this morning, Jim?"

He did not answer that; he went, instead, to the bell and rang for breakfast.

"That means that you don't," she said, with a little sigh. Then added, with a quick change of tone: "And do you know why you don't?"

"Since you know so much about me, perhaps you will tell me?" he suggested, speaking rather carefully.

"Well, that's why," she answered.

"What's why?" he demanded, and she laughed slightly.

"That I know so much about you."

He gave her a quick look, but breakfast being brought in at that moment, supplied him with an excellent excuse for leaving her unanswered.

The girl who brought in the breakfast tray was the one Lucy had already made friends with, and she was in a talkative mood, if Lee was not. As she arranged the dishes on the table, she asked whether the storm had disturbed their rest?

Lucy, glancing quickly at Lee, saw that he colored slightly before answering, with attempted casualness:

"Well, of course, we heard it, all right."

"They are saying this morning that the big elm down by Brady's Cottage was struck," the girl went on. "Where you said you was going yesterday, ma'am."

"Why, Jim, that must have been that terrific crash . . ." cried Lucy.

"They say it shook all Newchester," went on the girl. "Do you know these parts at all, sir? The question was directed towards Lee. He answered, smoothly enough:

"Yes, pretty well, some years ago," and they sat down to breakfast. When the girl had gone, Lee looked across at Lucy.

"I'll go and have a look at the tree this morning," he said.

"Oh, yes, do let's go and be gapping sightseers," she answered laughing.

"Well, I don't know about that. I was going over there in any case."

"Were you? What for?"

"To investigate this Billy Brady business you told me of."

"To investigate? Jim, don't you believe I told you the truth about it?"

He look at her quickly.

"Yes, it's just because it was the truth that I want to find out what it means," he said.

"Oh, I see, Jim, do you think it has anything to do with your affairs?" She leaned across the table, the words coming eagerly.

"I don't know. But it's a damn queer happening, and it looks to me as if Billy has gone past the point of harmless lunacy. He's about ready for some sort of restraint. I should imagine."

She nodded in agreement, and after a moment asked: "May I come with you?"

He hesitated; then:

"INSTANTLY!"

When a little later they were ready to start, a thought occurred to her, and looking up at him, she spoke it.

"Isn't there a danger of your being recognized?"

ROACHES

MADE IN CANADA

Every one of the Others has a Maid

At Edith's first "bridge" in her new home she makes a thrilling discovery . . .

"I do all my own work yet my hands are as nice looking as theirs"

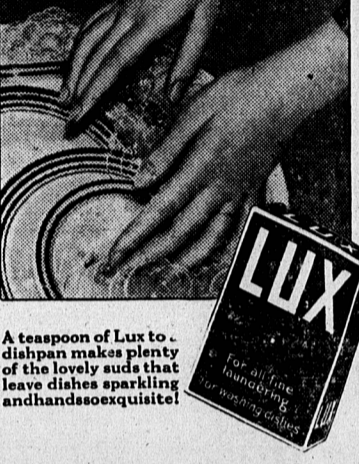

"DICK and I just moved to this charming suburb, but already we've met such an attractive 'young married' group."

"They're all more prosperous than we are—yet! Every one of the other women has a maid, while I do all my own work."

"So I was a little nervous about my first bridge. But it went off beautifully! They couldn't believe I did everything myself. Especially—they said—because my HANDS looked as if I had SEVERAL maids!

"Truly, my hands do look as lovely as theirs, and it's all due to my precious LUX. I use it not only for fine things, but also for dishes and cleaning. And my hands NEVER have that DISHPAN look!"

Beauty Experts

Experts in 305 famous BEAUTY SHOPS, who know all about the care of hands, say: "Pure, gentle Lux keeps a homemaker's hands as soft and white as those of a woman with maids." Yet it costs so little to give your hands beauty treatment with Lux; LESS THAN 1c A DAY!
