BROKEN WINGS by Barbara Webb

REBELLION Katherine had lain awake so long nursing her grievance that she slept the next morning. In the hour before she fell asleep she had concentrated all her misery on Bill. There was no justice in her feeling of resentment against him. She simply felt, down to the marrow of her bones, that he responsible for her present plight. And she soothed that resentment with the resolve to do nothing to further his plans. He would have to work alone. When she woke she found that he had dragged some boards from the Falcon, propped them in the sand, covered them with green branches, and thus formed a cool spot for her to slumber in. She felt no gratitude. She simply accepted this a proof that he realized that she was the one to be sheltered and protected. She stretched lazily and winced at the sand that ran down her neck when she turned. "I need a bath," she thought, "I'll have a swim somewhere today. It will make me feel better and do something to pass the time. Surely it won't be long before father gets here in the Seahawk." Bill was working around the Falcon when she stepped from her sandy bed. He waved to her and called, "There's a swell place to bathe, just around the curve of the beach, if you feel sandy. I've had mine and when you finish we'll have some breakfast."

He was not a prepossessing sight. Three days' growth of beard made an unpleasant stubble on his face. He had discarded all clothing save his khaki trousers, and these were rolled to his knees, leaving his legs and feet bare. Katherine said good morning distantly as she passed him. She felt unreasonably that he might have worn more clothes, might have made some attempt to shave, though she did not stop to remember that he had brought nothing with him, having planned to buy necessities in Honolulu and later in Sydney. Jackson would never, never let himself look like that.

"Wait a minute," he called. "I found some stuff of yours in the Falcon when I examined her innards this morning. Maybe you'll want them for your bath." He indicated a small case which Katherine remembered now had been her own special brand of bath soap, cold cream, perfume and powder, just before she left Sar Diego. "Thanks," she said, picking them up and tucking them under her arm. "Go easy on the soap," Bill advised her. "It may be a long time before we have any more, and if you've used you'll cut your clothes down to next to nothing. It's going to be one hot day and we have work to do." Katherine went on toward the bathing place he had indicated without answering. "Goah," Bill said to himself, "I hope she gets over that grouch soon."

Katherine found a small pool in the curve of the beach. The water was warm and shallow and she stripped off her clothes and stepped into its grateful depths. After dawdling around she tried using the soap and found that it made very little lather even when she rubbed it vigorously over her body. "It's the salt water," she decided. "He'll have to find some place where I can bathe in fresh water. This stuff will ruin my hair when it needs washing, too."

She felt refreshed when she stepped out and was annoyed at having no towel. There was none to be had, of course. While she was hesitating she found that the sun had dried her thoroughly, and that a dusting with her talcum powder, fragrant with lavender, took the sticky feeling away. It was hot. Too hot for the clothes she had been wearing. She had come away in a tweed suit, disdaining any sensational flying fogs. Now she discarded the coat and matching sweater, and put on only the shirt and tailored silk shirt. She hesitated over the stockings and then, as they were the only pair she had, decided to save them for the grand day of their rescue. But the shoes were uncomfortable without stockings, so she finally walked back to the Falcon in her bare feet.

Bill had made a fire and was cooking more clams over it. He looked up to smile at her. "Feel better? I see you've given up shoes. I have, too, except when we go to the woods when we'll have to wear them. Ready for ham and eggs?" Katherine looked discontentedly at the shellfish and with distaste at the cup of coconut milk he proffered. She started to refuse, and then realized that she was really hungry and would have to eat what there was to eat.

"Can't you find anything else except this stuff?" she asked when she had finished the coconut milk. "Sure, but it will take a little time. I have an idea we can find nests with eggs in them, and there may be fruit growing back on the island. I've got a plan for catching fish, and I think I can set traps and catch some birds. There may be rabbits or other small animals in the woods, too. Oh, we'll live high when we get on the ways of this place. But first thing we must do is rig up a signal of some kind, and then we must get some huts made."

"I've been looking around and I think we can make two, one for you and one for me on either side of that big rock. We'll pile branches down for a floor, cut the small limbs and leaves off, and lay leaves and all at an angle to form sides. Now, after breakfast, when we get our dishes washed," he waved the solitary thermos cup at her, "we'll get the huts built. I've cut a big pile of branches up at the edge of the woods there, and you can bring as many down as you can carry. About three trips and we'll have enough for the floors."

Katherine interrupted him. "Don't count on my help," she said in a final tone of voice. "Do you mean that you are going to continue refusing to be of any help in digging ourselves in comfortably here until we are rescued?" Bill asked evenly. "You may interpret it in that way if you choose."

"Suppose I order you to do your share?" "Ordering is one thing, getting me to take orders is another."

"I see." His quiet tone angered Katherine. "I won't be ordered about. I won't do a single thing unless I choose."

"No!" "No!" "As soon as we have finished here you will go to the edge of the forest and carry back the small branches you find there. You will make three or four trips, and after that you will help me build the hut you are to sleep in from now on."

Katherine set her lips. Bill had not even looked at her while making this command and she took refuge in silence, refusing to argue with him. He got up from the fire, banked it carefully to preserve the embers and strolled down to the edge of the freshwater stream where she saw him stoop and rinse out the one cup he possessed. Next he bustled himself with a long slender sapling, trying to plant it right in the sand.

When he had satisfied himself that it would stand he laid it down on the sand and attached his undershirt.

Royal Commission On Education

The Royal Commission on Education in Prince Edward Island will hold public meetings at centres in Queen's and King's Counties as follows:

Eldon, Tuesday, September 10th 10 a. m. Vernon River, Tuesday, September 10th, 2.30 p. m.

Unless otherwise stated all meetings will be held in the local school buildings. The Commission desires to meet and hear the representatives from the above centres and from the districts surrounding these centres who may wish to give information or suggestions on the problems under investigation. School Trustees and Secretaries of School boards are asked to be present.

To one end of it. Then he replanted the sapling and laughed when the shirt flapped slothfully in the mild breeze.

"Broken Wings Island. Sign of the Shirt," he called back to Katherine. "Now we've got the signal flying suppose you hustle those branches back here."

Katherine turned on her heel. "The clown! The fool! The idiot!" she said half aloud. Then she took a sudden revolve. Almost at a run she hurried toward the forest. At its edge she saw a pile of branches. Bill had cut in the morning. With one backward glance over her shoulder she stepped past the pile, into the coolness of the trees, on, deeper and deeper into the forest.
