THE TRAIINOR INQUEST.

The inquest on the body of the unfortunate man Francis Trainor, the evidence taken and the very emphatic verdict of the jury afford serious subjects of thought for the citizens of Charlottetown. Few will venture to say that the verdict is not supported by the evidence and perhaps the most damaging evidence was that given by the employers of the Light and Power Company. In this matter however the present Company controlling the lighting of the city may have been more or less the victims of misplaced confidence in the street plant which they took over by purchase from the Royal Electric Company. That confidence must now be sadly shaken, as is the confidence which many patrons of the electric light have heretofore had in the security of their lives and homes.

In fact the revelations of the inquest are truly alarming. Scores and perhaps hundreds of houses cheaply wired, the wiring inadequately insulated, transformers frequently at fault and sometimes turning the full voltage of the system into houses and shops with the imminent prospect of fire, (unless the greatest vigilance is exercised) or of death to an inmate in the ordinary process of turning on the light, as in Mr. Trainor's case, or the case of others who received violent shocks—such are the more alarming features of the situation. But our dangers do not end here. The multiplicity of wires about our streets, for the telegraph, the telephone, the primary and secondary conductors of the lighting system—these wires hung in some cases very close together, sometimes in parallel lines and in other cases crossing each other, these wires swaying with the wind and sometimes loaded with rain, snow or ice, are in danger of contact which may carry the full death-dealing voltage of the system we know not whither.

And there is no inspection, no oversight of the wires or installation save such as the present or past companies and the un-instructed patron may have exercised. The patron who wants the electric light put in his premises has his house wired in many cases as cheaply as possible, knowing little of the value of good insulation, but caring much for the difference in cost. And there is no authority to adjudicate upon the conflicting rights and claims of the telegraph, telephone and lighting companies each of which has been given the right to set their poles and wires about the streets. Clearly these conditions ought not to be permitted to continue. An inspector is urgently needed, and from a thorough inspection we may learn more precisely what our present danger, the result of the operations of former and the present lighting companies, and what is necessary to be done to afford security for the future.

We cannot rest re the dead to life, but if the recurrence of similar casualties is to be prevented prompt and energetic action by the civic authorities is necessary. Let an expert be called to make a thorough inspection and ascertain what dangers exist and what is necessary to be done to remove them. If legislation is found necessary for this purpose let it be sought and obtained. Warned as we have been it would be criminal to neglect every reasonable precaution for the future safety of the city and its people. We have been playing with death, and a share of the responsibility rests upon the city which has neglected the duty of inspection and supervision. For obvious reasons at this stage we forbear to pass upon the alleged neglect of the Light and Power Company.

The cable tells of a long list of honor to officers who commanded in South Africa. Lori Methuen, brave but unfortunate in the field, is given the higher grade of the Order of the Bath. Generals French and Ian Hamilton are made Lieutenant Generals, both well-earned promotions. Colonels Kekewich, (defender of Kimberly) and Plumer, are made Major Generals. Major General F. W. Kitcheener is made a C. B. Brigadier General Brant becomes an honorary Major General. Two Canadians share in the new honors, Lieut.-Col. Fiset and Capt. McMillan, receiving the decoration of Companions of the Distinguished Service Order.

The death is announced of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, one of the foremost advocates of women suffrage and of the most gifted women whom the United States has produced. She died at her home in New York, October 26, at the advanced age of 87 years. She was a daughter of Judge Daniel Cady. When she was ten years of age her only brother died and Judge Cady expressed the wish that his daughter had been a son. She then made up her mind that if she could not be a boy she would try to accomplish what a boy could. She became a girl athlete, and after completing her studies married in 1840 Henry Brewster Stanton, the anti-slavery orator and author. Later she issued the first call for a woman's rights convention. Since 1840 she has been actively identified with the movement for advancing the legal status of women. She was for years editor of The Revolution, a woman's rights journal and also the editor of three large volumes of nearly 1,000 pages each entitled The History of Woman Suffrage.

There is just one thing noteworthy about The Patriot's new outbreak of interviews, this time with Summerside in the lead—they are all shy of the guarantee bonds. Capt. Read, who through the main portion of his interviews talks much like a promoter, when he comes to the bond question admits that "a good deal can be said on both sides... I do not care to give my personal opinion at this stage as to which is the proper course to adopt." Of seven or eight others whose remarks are quoted in The Patriot of Saturday barely one—a member of the firm of Warren Hicks & McMurdo Brothers,—squarely endorses the bond guarantee! All the rest talk generalities about the value of enterprise, capital, developing our resources and other matters upon which everybody is agreed. But they all show that they don't like the guarantee. In fishing for endorsement of the bond guarantee, The Patriot has toiled day and night and caught nothing. Nothing can exceed the unanimity with which all classes of the people reject the guarantee proposal.
