BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess) THE FRIGHTFUL MONSTER Monsters you most often find. Art but figments of the mind. —Old Mother Nature. Two happy-go-lucky folks were wandering about far back in the Green Forest. They were Jumper the Hare and Peter Rabbit. Neither had ever been in this part of the Green Forest, so everything was new to them. It is fun to wander about in strange places. They were finding it so now. It was so much fun that they had forgotten why they had come over there; the purpose of their visit. It often is that way with happy-go-lucky people. They start out to do something and before it is accomplished they forget all about it.

It was quite and peaceful and very lovely. There were open places in bright sunshine. There were shadowy places, and some places where the evergreen trees grew close, shutting away the sunshine. They were really dark. They were good places in which to get out of sight should there be need. They were equally good for hungry folks with liking for Rabbit dinners to be hidden in. So wandering about there was a constant adventure, just enough so to be pleasantly exciting.

They came to a place where a big tree had fallen long before. Just outside and under the fallen top the ground was almost white with the flowers and the flecks of light. It looked as if under that fallen tree top would be a lovely place to rest a while and perhaps take a nap. Both had been out all night and were beginning to feel a little tired and a little sleepy. "Suppose we go over there and sit," said Peter. "I was just going to say the same thing," replied Jumper. So they headed for the fallen tree-top. They hopped across a small opening toward what looked like a good place to creep under. Around it and just under the pile of brush, for this is what that fallen top now was, the ground was thickly spotted. But they had seen so many of those little white blossoms and splintered sunbeams that they no longer noticed them. They thought only of getting under cover and taking a nap. They even carelessly stepped on some of those little flowers without knowing it.

Just as they were where the flowers appeared to be in greatest numbers there was a frightful noise a short distance away. The hearts of those two long-legged cousins seemed to jump right up in their throats. But if their hearts didn't really jump, Jumper made a flying leap in one direction and Peter in another, and they kept right on jumping for that is the way Rabbit folk run—in long jumps as fast as their long hind legs can move. Aside from the frightful noise, they didn't know what they were running from and

Contract Bridge

By Josephine Culbertson

A SUCCESSFUL BLUFF South's only chance for his slam in today's contract, after a highly unfavorable opening lead, was to throw dust in an opponent's eyes and he did just that, with remarkable efficiency.

Bridge hand diagram showing cards: ♠ K5, ♥ KQJ87, ♦ A65, ♣ 84. Bidding table with North, East, South, West bids.

West opened the diamond king and, right there and then, South saw that he would have to lose a diamond (and a heart trick unless he did quite a bit of maneuvering. It would be patently futile to try to establish a heart trick for a diamond discard, because the defender who took the heart ace would promptly return a diamond.
