HEARTS AFIRE

By Mae Christie

"You'll let us know how the search proceeds?" Mrs. Vansittart, moved with compunction at his drawn face and twitching hands, followed him out into the hall. "And if there's anything I can do..."
"Nothing. Nothing." The fairer would die rather than be indebted to this woman in whose house such calamity had befallen his daughter. Then muttering brokepeely something about it's being enough to kill Prudence's mother, he rushed away.

"So terrible, my dear! I declare I'm ready to go off into hysterics! Quick get parking to pour me out some brandy." The lady of the house addressed Virginia, who hastened to the butler's pantry, presently returning with the butler, who bore on a silver tray a bottle, a couple of glasses, and a soda-siphon. "Ah! now I feel better." She dismissed the servant with a nod.

"I'll take some myself," volunteered Miss Virginia coolly, pouring out a liberal libation, and adding soda to it.
Mrs. Vansittart stared at her. "I thought you'd sworn off, and gone 'on the water wagon,' as you call it."
Virginia drained the glass before she spoke.

"Even doctors think brandy necessary at times. I'm taking this as medicine."
Her hostess tittered disagreeably. "Medicine? And you as strong as a horse!"
That annoyed Virginia. When irritated, she was capable of raptier thrusts. But that tendency must not be given way to, as her position in the house was scarcely as secure as it had been. Mrs. Vansittart was notoriously fickle in her likings, and recently had shown symptoms of wearying of Virginia.

"I've rather an awkward mission before me," the girl said quietly, hiding her annoyance.
"Huh? What's that? Not on the track of Peter Armstrong again are you?"

This wasn't diplomatic. But the speaker didn't care. Virginia had shed the light of her countenance too long at Wyndham Towers. Also, she showed no signs of paying back the sixty pounds she owed her hostess. And her important airs were quite absurd, in view of one or two matters with which the older woman was cognizant.
Virginia struggled with her rising temper. She contrived to give her hostess a smile, although just now it was an effort.
"We are great—friends."
"And you'd like to be something more?" The stimulant had given Mrs. Vansittart courage for the fray. "And so you're off to hurl the news about the Prudence child right at the man's head, thinking in that way to cure his fancy for her? You're clever, Jimmy—but not clever enough—and you DON'T know much about real men—men like Peter Armstrong? Why, stupid that you are, don't you realize that that strong type always tends to side with the under-dog—that pity is akin to love—and that you'll only drive him all the faster towards the girl!"

CHAPTER XXIII

Trapped!
On the evening of the long, heart-breaking day in London, when every attempt at finding work had been frustrated, and never in all her life had she felt so utterly alone, Prudence hunted feebly through a telephone-book for the address of Midhurst Buildings.

She could not find it. She asked a policeman, who informed her that probably such a building would be in the city.
"Take a bus to the Bank of England, then inquire," he advised her.
So—spending three of her few remaining pennies—she boarded a lumbering vehicle, and climbed up to the roof.
"You'd best go in a post office, miss, and have a look at a directory," a policeman near the Bank told her, when she reached the end of her trip. "But I'm afraid all office-buildings will be locked up now. It's nearly eight o'clock."
A post-office official found the same thing.
"You'll have to walk it. It's nearly a mile from here." He gave her intricate directions ament the winding streets and alleyways that compose the world's financial art.
Prudence lost her way several times, and was further discomfited by a heavy shower of rain. The night was very close and sultry, and thunder was about. She hated thunder, being terrified of storms.
At last she reached the tall, gloomy buildings where Janet Mercer's friend was caretaker, and on the very doorstep met the woman

"Mrs. Smith... It's I, Prudence Page... you remember..."
"Lawks have mercy! Janet Mercer's friend! How are you, my dear? And what brings you to the city?"
Mrs. Smith was genuinely astonished.
Prudence stammered out a vague story about coming to London to find work, and having lost her purse.
"But we'll lend you the money for your fare back, dearie. You'll be going home, of course?"
The girl's pale, tired face flushed up. That flush wasn't lost up on the kindly couple.
"—I can't go home... not in the meantime... if you could just give me a bed for to-night... you promised you would, any time..."
Mrs. Smith exchanged glances with her husband.
"But we've just locked the whole place up for the night. We've got a holiday to-morrow, and we're catching the nine-ten for West-cliffe, to visit my husband's sister."
"Fears of fatigue and disappointment rose to Prudence's eyes, so that Mr. Smith—to whom beauty in distress made irresistible appeal—said quickly:
"Maggie, why shouldn't we let her have the flat to-night?"
His wife hesitated. She looked uncertainly at Prudence.
"Wouldn't you be afraid, in that great building, all alone? You could lock the door of the flat, of course... it's a parlour, bedroom, kitchen, and box-room, self-contained... and you'd be quite safe, of course... but still..."
Her husband broke in with a hearty:
"Oh, she'd be all right, Maggie! Better for her than an hotel. And we'll be home to-morrow night."
Prudence gently, gloomily at the outside of the great building was the flat promised refuge. And she hadn't any money for hotels!
So the caretaker and his wife, greatly wondering at her advent in the city, took her up in the lift to the eighth floor, and let her into their private premises.
"There's electric light, and I'll change the sheets of the bed in a jiffy." Capable Mrs. Smith soon had everything in readiness for the unexpected guest. "And there's bread and tea and sugar in the cupboard, and some eggs. You can use the gas-cooker."
Then the pair had to hurry off to catch their train.
It was rather eerie, in the flat, perched up so high above the world, and Prudence undressed quickly, climbing into the enormous feather bed.
No sooner was she there than—horror of horrors!—thunder broke outside in a fury, the lightning flashed, the rain came down in torrents!
Prudence crawled below the bed-clothes, trembling.
But the storm raged on and on, growing louder, till the crashes seemed directly overhead, and the

David and Jonathan (The Story)

The king's son was fascinated by the shepherd boy's exploit. There he stood in the royal presence, with almost modest composure answering Saul's question and admitting freely his humble parentage. His heroic deed was transfused with piety. He had done it as unto the Lord, avenging him of his insulting adversary. He would now go back to his flock in the Judean hills.

Jonathan was struck with consuming admiration. His own dauntless and devout soul had found its mate. The ideal friendship thus begun was rooted in a common theocratic faith. This accounts for its phenomenal strength and persistency. It was sealed by a graceful and significant act when Jonathan clothed David with his own princely raiment and gave him his sword. This was the highest possible token of friendship of which a modern analogy is found within the tangled boundary of conflicting obligations. He saw that his father's envy of David was groundless and refused his aid to make away with him. He even got a promise of safety for David. When that promise was broken he warned the victim of his danger. At the same time he gave his father indisputable evidence of his loyalty. He fought for him and died with him.

Under the Study Lamy "Friendship"

Pythagoras saying "one soul in two bodies", is the classic counterpart to the Scripture that the soul of Jonathan was knit to that of David... Friendship may be the best or the evillest thing in the world when as in this instance it is based upon a common and true faith and guided by a mutual purpose of obedience to God it is a fragrant remnant of paradise. Friendship not so based has elements of positive danger. This ideal friendship ripened in a storm. "Washington once said "True friendship is a plant of slow growth, and must stand the shock of adversity before it is entitled to the appellation..." Ser-

Great Missionary Characters

The various professions and occupations in which men are employed are like constellations in the heavens. Whenever a genius, a star of first magnitude appears, all are stimulated and take on a new luster. It has been preeminently so in the field of Christian missions. Who can ever measure the inspirational power of the out-standing examples of courage, persistency and faith with which they overcame the apparently insurmountable obstacles. Their brightness and power is undiminished by the lapse of time.

To Think About

What is the advantage of knowing the lives of great missionaries? What qualities are most important in missionaries? How may we help and cheer our missionaries?
room was brilliant with lighting. The rain poured down as though all the waters of the universe had been let loose.
Prudence had read about the terrible air-raids in the Great War, but none ever had been louder or more intimidating than this ghastly storm!
Suddenly, the building seemed to totter as crash after crash deafened the crouching girl. She cried aloud in terror.
Above the storm, she heard the sharp tinkling of the telephone beside the bed.
With trembling fingers she lifted the receiver from its hook.
There was a long and eerie pause, and then a hoarse voice trickling from far away, across the wires.
"Hello! Hello! Midhurst Buildings."
"Yes, Yes."
"Is it true that you're on fire? The lightning hit a wire on the roof connecting with the motor-room, and—"
The receiver fell from Prudence's fingers.
