A HUSBAND TO MARCIA

By CAROLYN BEECHER

Chapter LXII

Not for weeks had Marcia been so angry. In spite of all she had said her refusal to allow John to adopt that boy, he had taken the care of him upon himself and was sending money to some unknown woman for his support. It was almost unbelievable that he should go against her wishes in such a manner.

"It will, no good for you to take on so, Marcia. You will only make yourself ill."

"You mean to tell me that you intend to go on supporting that child when I go without so many things, I want?"

"Yes, Marcia, I might lie about it but I will not. I am going to pay for Kenneth's care and educate him. He is a most lovable little boy and will more than repay all I can do for him. It isn't much, Marcia; just a few dollars each month."

"Who is this Doran woman?"

"For the first time, John tried to suppress the entire truth.

"She is an elderly lady, ill, who has taken Kenneth to help out her living expenses and she loves him dearly."

"Hush! She loves your money?"

"Come, Marcia, be reasonable."

"Reasonable! You are the unreasonable one. Why, I never heard of such idiocy! You take the care of a perfect stranger's boy upon yourself—what for?"

"Because I love children, Marcia, and you have refused them to me. I saw a great deal of Kenneth, while you were in Europe and I learned to love him, and he me. I can feel his little arms around my neck now. I would dearly have loved to have him here. But I would not risk making you unhappy by insisting upon it. But in this you must keep your hands off, Marcia. The boy is my affair."

Tears, recriminations left their just where they started. Finally John said:

"Marcia, I shall never refer to little Kenneth again. I trust you will not. But I shall care for him as if he were my son."

Marcia wept and pitied herself as an abused wife long after John had left for the office. Money for a stranger's child, and deny her the simple things she needed to make her home attractive. She telephoned for her car, the luxury that John had refused her and which he so seldom used.

She drove to the store where she had seen the rug she wanted. Once again she had in unrolled and then after a moment's hesitation said:

"I have one other in view. Will you hold this for me until 3 o'clock?"

"Gladly, Mrs. Aldrich. I am sure you will not be pleased with any other," the suave salesman declared.

The happenings of the next hour we will keep secret. But Marcia emerged at the end of that time from a certain shop with a flushed face and shining eyes.

"Home, Howard," she said to her chauffeur, a smile of satisfaction on her lips.

At 5 o'clock she was back at the shop and had paid for the rug. "Have it delivered by 11 o'clock," she said to the now smiling salesman.

"Surely, madame. It will be there on the hour."

The look of satisfaction still lingered on Marcia's lips when John came in to dinner, but she said nothing, and he, rejoiced that she did not bring up the subject of his eating for little Kenneth, exerted himself to entertain her.

After dinner Bob and Nell French came in and they played bridge until 10 o'clock. Then Bob said:

"Come on, Nell; I am not going to have John's Nell broke by the man's all in and don't seem to realize it."

"Don't talk like that, Bob" Marcia broke in, "you give me the shivers."

"I wish I could give you something else, sense enough to take care of John. The man is either worked to death or worried. Same thing as far as his health goes."

"He has no reason to be either," Marcia answered coldly. "He surely has nothing to worry about, and he works hard because he wants to, perhaps has to if he does foolish things he had no right to do."

It was the first time Marcia had ever spoken in derogatory terms of John before any one and Bob only stared at her as he replied:

"Well just make him call a halt before he gets down sick on you hands. John's Nell broke by."

"I expect every member of the club will be here tomorrow, Marcia. They all say they enjoy coming to you."

"I love to have them. How do you like my curtains, Nell?"

"Scrumptious! But you do manage to have things up to date always."

"I should be a fool if I didn't." Only John understood Marcia's cryptic reply.

A LITTLE FLOWER

A little flower placed on her breast mound;
A silent thought of trust so pure;
Oh, hear that not, that whispering sound,
Courage, brave one, hope and endurance.

A little flower placed on her breast
With trusting hand I laid it so;
A cry that from her place of rest,
To guide her loved one here be low.

A little flower, a silent prayer
Oh, comfort him who wails thine own;
Protect and guard from every care
Thine own loved one, now here alone.

A little flower, placed on the sod
If a dearer thought than thine;
A heartfelt cry, oh Thou, my God,
Teach him to say: "Thy Will be Done."

A little flower so pure and fair;
A blossom sweet to not and smile;
To ease the load, the cross of care,
To soothe the heart for a little while.
