"A blonde is not always a light-headed girl."

Black: Why, I had hardly met him, don't you know, when he called me a fool. What sort of a fellow is he?
Brown: Oh, he's a wise guy, all right.

"Did she marry the man who rescued her?"
"Yes, and now she's discovered that her life was the only thing he ever saved."

Reggy: Oh, yes; I've been a shipping clerk in a drygoods store for years.

Married Quarters

By DAVID LYALL

Continued

Sylvia, with her hairpins in her mouth, managed to enunciate the word "doubtful," which pretty accurately summed up the situation. Poppy had now been ten days in Markyate-at-Stone, and was doing her best to fit in. But there are occasions in life when even the best falls far short of the desired pinnacle of achievement.

Some time afterwards, trying to describe to Naomi how difficult the situation had been, Susan Bradford summed it up in a very homely way which had a touch of native shrewdness.

"It all minded me on nothing, Naomi, but one of them silly bits of advice they put out from the Food Office for the bamboozlement of housekeepers. You'll maybe remember it, if you didn't try it. When the butter was so very short, we was told to mix our 'marge' with sweet milk. Sounded all right, and I spent a whole morning 'tryin' it. Beat it fust till my arm ached, and then the 'marge' sat as impudent as you like in the middle of the milk, like an island in an ocean. Then I melted the lot, beat it again till it was lovely creamy froth, then set it by to cool all night, expectin' as the silly newspaper stuff said, to see it set into a lovely bit of eatable stuff. What 'appened? There it was, the 'marge' settin' in the middle same as afore I touched it, and the milk lookin' no better for the bashin' it had had, creepin' round about the base. Well, that's how it's been w' us an' Jim's wife. We don't mix, and never will."

Poppy, looking very, very young and incredibly sweet, entered the gorgeous drawing-room of Haddon Hall with a slightly hesitating air.

She was very simple and girlish, but she had the effect of a cold douche on these energetic, capable and self-satisfied women.

They became in some indefinable way conscious of the gulf fixed, a gulf which all the profiteering in the world would never bridge.

Jane began to loathe her pink bows, her pink frock, the brass cake-stand, the flight of butterflies painted on the door plates.

Mrs. Cotman had made up her mind that she would kiss Jim's wife, especially if any other callers were in the room but somehow when she saw she lost courage, and merely shook hands, murmuring effusively:

"So glad you were able to come, my dear; so pleased to see you. I hope you are very well and beginning to feel quite at home among us all in Markyate."

"I am quite well, thank you, and quite at home," answered Poppy; then shook hands with both of her new cousins, and took the chair Jane set for her with much effusion, sitting down herself close by, glad of the opportunity to have a few words before any other callers should arrive.

"Did you walk up? What a shame; why, we ought to have come in the car for you. Why didn't we go in the car to fetch Poppy, Sylvia?" she said, getting out the name with a jerk, which indicated that she was not quite sure whether it would be acceptable. Poppy gave a little start, but managed directly to smile.

"Oh, it is only a little distance, and I don't think Mrs. Bradford is tired, as we walked very slowly."

"I suppose you don't walk much at Cudham Ferrars?" said Jane inquiringly.

"Yes, we do, we walk miles and miles every day—at least we used to before the war took up all the time there is."

"Didn't you ride and drive and have motors?" asked Jane breathlessly.

"Yes, we did all these things occasionally, of course, the same as other people do them, but walking is always the very nicest kind of exercise, don't you think, especially when one has a lot of dear dogs who need exercise and positively howl for it when it isn't forthcoming? I hope you have a dog here, Miss Cotman?"

"Well, no, we haven't. We had two when we lived down in the town, but Ma got rid of them. In a house like this they're too messy, and unfortunately, we had indulged them very much, and they would have thought they had a perfect right to get up on the sofas and cushions just as they used to do in the old house."

"Why, of course, the darlings, why shouldn't they? And what did you do with them?"
"We gave one away and Ma sent for the vet, to give the other a gentle dose. He was quite old, really, but we didn't dare tell Pa for quite a few days."
"Did he mind very much when you did tell him? I hope he did," said Poppy in a queer, uneven voice.
"I should think he did, didn't he, Sylvia? He said he never would have left the house if he'd known it meant giving up Tatters and Leo."
"Is he in this afternoon?" asked Poppy rather wistfully. "I should so much like to see him," which was tantamount to saying that she considered him the most human creature in the house.
"Oh, no Pa's never in on Ma's 'at-home' days. Very few gentlemen like so as to get them both here with me to help entertain."
"But what is it for? Don't you find it frightfully boring?" asked Poppy calmly.
Mrs. Cotman smiled archly.
"If we are bored, we don't show it; that's good manners, isn't it, my dear? Now tell me how you are liking this part of the country. How romantic it was of you to marry as you did; quite necessary," she added, wishing to be quite polite. "People just come when they like."
"But when everybody is busy, like we are now, we find it absolutely necessary to have an 'at-home' day, don't we, mother? Poppy says they don't have them in Norfolk."
"I only said I didn't know anybody who had them," Poppy added. The two mothers, who had been whispering in the farther corner of the room, turned animatedly towards the girls. Mrs. Cotman rose and came to Poppy's side.
"You go and talk to Aunt Susan. Jane, I want a word with dear Poppy before the crowd arrives."
"Will there be a crowd—and why?" asked Poppy innocently, rising out of deference to an older woman.
"We generally do have a lot of people," said Mrs. Cotman in a satisfied voice. "You see, we have a great many friends in Markyate and both my girls are very popular. They are so busy now with the canteen that I've had to have only one day a month, so as to get them both here with me to help entertain."
"But what is it for? Don't you find it frightfully boring?" asked Poppy calmly.
Mrs. Cotman smiled archly.
"If we are bored, we don't show it; that's good manners, isn't it, my dear? Now tell me how you are liking this part of the country. How romantic it was of you to marry as you did; quite necessary," she added, wishing to be quite polite. "People just come when they like."
