Many Amazing Stories Told Of Modern India

In the larger cities of India today one may see a taxi-driver pull up suddenly and, with his scarf spread upon the pavement, kneel down to pray. When he has finished he gets into his cab again and drives off.

That is because five times a day every Moslem, no matter where he is, must engage in prayer. But this incident shows that though the India of today is in many respects westernized, the people have remained utterly different at heart.

After a century the educational advance has been very small. Only eight per cent of the entire population is able to read and write. The remaining three hundred millions remain sublimely ignorant.

In his recently published book, "India Marches East," R. J. M'neely unfolds vividly the story of India, traces its bloodstained history down to the present day.

Superstition holds India in its grip. The story is told of a Rajah whose death had been predicted by a seer. Instantly he abandoned all affairs of state and retired to the jungle to purify his soul. But his devoted vizier followed him. Every argument was tried to induce the royal master to return. But in vain. Had not the astrologer prophesied it? The astrologer should know. So the vizier went to the astrologer and dragged him into the royal presence in the jungle. "Do you still say that His Majesty is about to die?"

"Such is the decree of Fate," nodded the astrologer.

"And your own hour of death—can you foretell that too?" asked the vizier.

"I shall die," said the astrologer slowly, "in seven years and two months from now. So the stars have decreed."

The vizier instantly drew his sword and killed the man.

"Look, your majesty. How can you rely upon the word of one who could not predict his own death correctly?"

There are Indian holy men, Yogis, who have acquired such a mastery of their breathing that they can throw themselves into a trance for days. Their control of breath, the author relates, is so extraordinary that there have been recorded instances of Yogis suspending their animation and seeming dead for periods varying from a few days to five or six weeks. There is this remarkable illustration.

A Yogi named Haridas put himself into a trance in the presence of the Maharajah himself. The man was then buried in a garden outside the city. A close watch was kept upon the grave for forty nights and days. At the end of that time he was lifted out of the grave, cold, stiff and still unconscious. Animation was resorted to—and in a little while the man recovered completely.

India, explains the author, is one of the poorest countries in the world. There is unparalleled magnificence at one end of the scale—nobles in costly silks and satins lolling in palaces of marble and ivory. At the other is grovelling poverty—more than five hundred million people doomed to exist on an individual income of no more than fifteen dollars a year.

The Maharajah of Patiala's palace is a quarter of a mile long, with an all marble terrace along its entire length. There are three hundred motor cars in his garage.

The Maharajah of Gwalior wears a string of pearls worth $2,500,000. His father built a miniature train for use at State dinners. It comprises an engine and seven cars, all made of solid silver. The track is laid round the dining table, along his travel cigars, cigarettes and liquors to the guests. At the Maharajah's hand is an electric button for control. The wealth of some of these Indian princes makes Henry Ford or Rockefeller seem like poor men.

"The mail goes through!"

And the courage, skill, and intrepid flying it takes to make this motto of the air mail fleet good provides the thrilling theme of the great aviation classic, "Air Mail," which opened an engagement at the Prince Edward Theatre, treating the audience assembled for its long-awaited local premiere to some of the most spectacular flying scenes ever witnessed on the screen.

The story concerns a group of mail pilots stationed in an isolated desert airport whose job is to relay the mail through treacherous mountain passes to the coast beyond. With a storm raging, those who attempt the passage go to a certain death, leaving only the airport chief and his ace flyer, a cocky, unruly soldier of fortune to put through

Buck Jones In "Treason" At Capitol

Buck Jones recalls vivid memories of those heroic scouts of the old West, Buffalo Bill, Pawnee Bill, Ed Carson and the rest, in his latest picture, "Treason," at the Capitol Theatre, for he plays the role of a gallant cavalry scout in Kansas in the troublous days immediately following the close of the Civil War.

Detailed to bring back, dead or alive, a woman warrior whose soldiers have been terrifying Kansas, Jones makes good his mission, only to find that he has helped to bring the shadow of the noose about the neck of the woman he loves.

Action is the keynote of "Treason." Besides the splendid performances by Jones and Miss Grey, the picture has some other worthy characterizations, notably that of a villainous officer given by Robert Ellis. Others in the cast are Frank Lupton, Art Mix, T. J. Jacks, Ivar McRadden, Charles Hill Malles, Edwin Stanley, Ed. Le Saint and Nick Cogley.

Miss Grey plays the role of Joan Randall, head of a band of Confederate sympathizers who have set up the Republic of South Kansas. The Government has offered a reward of $10,000 for her capture, dead or alive. Jones is the intrepid Army scout detailed to bring her in. He is surprised to discover that the woman sought by the Government is a murderess, burner of villages and robber, is actually a beautiful young woman, who believes sincerely in the justice of her cause. After many stirring escapades, Jones captures her and she is tried for murder and found guilty. Despite his fervent plea for her, she is sentenced to be hanged. Then, in a great race against time he rides to the Governor, wins a pardon, and saves her life.

New and Promising Market for Nickel

According to a statement recently published by the president of the International Nickel Company, experimentation, started in 1925 to demonstrate to industry that the properties of cast iron can be materially improved by the addition of nickel, has opened a new and promising market for nickel. This article further states that nickel cast irons now have relatively the same position as that held by nickel steels 25 years ago and nickel may parallel in the cast iron field the substantial market it has already established in the steel industry.

BLUENOSE SKIPPER TELLS HIS STORY

Treats Matter Lightly—Claims Stillwell Cause of Trouble.

CHICAGO, Aug. 10—A.P.—It was a different story of the cruise of the Canadian Bluenose skipper Angus Walters told tonight from that recounted by Addison Stillwell, broker and clubman.

Stillwell sued the skipper of the internationally known racing schooner for $5,000 damages claiming that a $2,500 charter for a fortnight's cruise was violated; his guests insulted and finally forced to leave the craft at Milwaukee because of conditions aboard.

Served With Wit

Captain Walters today was served with a writ of attachment on the ship pending posting of $10,000 bond and disposal of the damage suit.

Commented the Captain: "Well this is what I call a good joke. I'm not worried, but I believe Mr. Stillwell will be a sick man before this is all over."

He charged some of the guests became disorderly on the MacKinnac trip.

"The episode of Milwaukee the Captain blamed on the stock market.

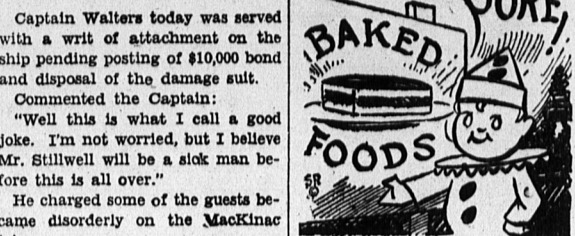

"When we becalmed off Milwaukee," he said, "the 'Admiral' (Stillwell) listened to wireless reports of the market. One of his pet stocks dropped a point. For a while I was afraid I might have to clap him in irons, so violent did he become."

"He waved his arms and shouted he must be put ashore. To accommodate him I finally picked up a tow and took him into Milwaukee where he boarded a train and returned to attend to his business."

The Bluenose was free to go about Illinois waters tonight carrying passengers. Stillwell's Attorney agreed to let the craft leave its pier with the understanding the bond will be posted tomorrow.

Captain Walters posted the attachment notice in his cabin under a horseshoe nailed to the wall.
