GENERAL BOTHA'S WAY. a born leader and could wield a wonderful influence over his men. Here is an instance of his "way" with them, and an example of how he could, in the space of half an hour, persuade them to do for him what they resolutely declined to do for their other officers. During the German South-West campaign a commando brigade after a rather rough voyage from Cape Town to Swakopmund, were camped in the desert beyond that port. When ordered to march inland, the burghers "struck" and refused to trek further. Their officers begged, implored, and threatened them, all without result. After some time, General Botha arrived, mounted a wagon, called the men around him, and in some such words as these, proceeded to deal with the situation. "Would they tell him their grievances, as man to man and friend to friend?" Angry individuals said they would, and did. The general's soft, tactful and sympathetic answers gradually mollified the angry crowd. "Now, would they give him their reason for not wanting to march?" "Yes," came the reply. "The commanding officers had promised them that after three months service they would be relieved by others and allowed to return to their farms, and they meant to go home." The wily general knew of the intense aversion these men had for the sea, heightened so recently to most of them by their recollections of the pangs of mal de mer. So he carried out: "None Like the Sea."

"Well, perhaps it could be arranged for them to go home; how many wanted to return by sea?" Though this gave promise of a quick return to the bosom of his family, not a man stepped forward to grasp the opportunity. "Then, which of them would like to go overland?" From all sides cheerful, lusty voices clamoured their willingness to face the long journey by road. The general smiled, and after a pause said: "Then, my dear friends, come on, we'll all go together, and our nearest way home lies through Windhoek." Windhoek had, of course, not then been captured. The brawny, simple boers appeared momentarily puzzled, then, as the joke revealed itself to them, turned to laugh at those most willing to go a few moments ago, but gradually it dawned upon them that the joke was against them all, and a crest-fallen look came on to their faces. But the angry mood was gone, seeing that they had been fairly caught napping, laughingly shouted: "Yes, general, we shall come with you."

And then they cheerfully took their part in the brilliant series of hard forced marches through the desert and along dried river beds, with very short rations of food and water for man and horse, which culminated in the taking of Karibib and all that followed after. Nor did it appear to worry them in the least that had that natural stronghold, Karibib, been strongly held, and gigantic bluff which brought them, worn, weary and on exhausted mounts, right out of touch with any base, and the nearest water supply many, many miles behind, might have ended in a fiasco with disastrous results. They had promised their general to "zaam gaan," and for him and with him they went. And were they not, also, on the nearest way home?
