Red Cross Special

By GARRY ALLIGHAN LONDON, Oct. 1.—A half-million bombs have fallen on this small country, yet it is possible to travel 200 miles from London into Devon without seeing one heap of rubble, one wrecked building or even a crater. I forgot the horrors of bomb raids as the train thundered through Wiltshire, whose lush low-lands slope luxuriantly up into the woods. Flocks of sheep looked like toys from a child's Noah's Ark. Yokels sat on five-barred gates sleepily amiable, doing nothing with engrossed thoroughness. Two hundred miles of rustic serenity, tranquillity and peace dramatically terminated at Plymouth, a blitzed city of tragedy. It is now nearly six months since the first blitz caught the city fathers unprepared. They had failed to learn the lessons of London and Coventry. Thousands of families trooped from lane to lane in an exodus as pathetic as that of the children of Israel. Lane-side ditches were dormitories where whole families slept under hedges and beside haystacks or in open fields. Five blitzes in eight nights set the tempers of Plymouth's people on edge against the alleged lack of preparations. That this situation did not turn uglier is due to the Red Cross, which went with the people into the highways and byways with Canadian gifts of blankets and soup and beverages.

Never Quiet Week

That first blitz brought the Canadian Red Cross right to the forefront of the Plymouth picture. It never has shifted. Not a week passes without warnings of enemy aircraft making for the city, either for a direct raid or en route elsewhere. And every night Canadian Red Cross gifts of food and clothing are dispensed among the 150,000 left in Plymouth. Last month garments were distributed to 8,000 people.

I told a taxi driver at the station "Take me to 21 George St." I knew it as the address of a Red Cross clothing depot. "Ain't no George St. now, sir," he growled. I discovered the clothes depot had been demolished with a large stock. Replenishments were poured down from Bristol by anything on four wheels. Three empty houses were commandeered for depots. Next night they were among Plymouth's ruins.

Now the Red Cross stocks are centralized in 30 houses 10 or 15 miles from the city. Supplies go first to a central depot at Plymouth where they are sorted, repacked, demoted, card-indexed and sent out the same day. It is possible to know from the records where every article goes. A fleet of cars is on duty nightly transporting required items from the reserves to shelters.

Repair 50,000 Homes Already the authorities have repaired 52,000 dwellings, which is 10,000 more than Plymouth's total because many have been bombed and repaired more than once. A small army of demolition workers never stops work. The centre of the city is a depressing scene of devastation, with fine avenues of stores wrecked, a magnificent Gothic hall gutted, the old parish church of St. Andrew's in ruins. Private houses now are stores with handbarrows forming street markets.

Across the shattered front of gutted Saint Andrew's is a huge, one-word motto: "Resurgam." And on Plymouth Hoe stands the statue of Drake, looking on the Nazi-threatened water as calm as when he insisted on finishing his game of bowls before annihilating that other armada which nursed the quaint notion of invasion.
