The Girl Who Wants to Hold Her Husband Must Keep Up With Him Mentally—Sad Result of too Early Marriage—Are All Men Faithless?

Dear Miss Dix—Any worth-while man has ambitions toward which he is constantly working. As success and advancement come his wife must keep step with his progress unless she is a handicap to him.

A great many women feel that marriage gives them the privilege of slumping intellectually as well as physically, and especially that they have a right to do so after the children come.

Many women also regard marriage as a reason for burying their talents in a napkin. They may have a pretty gift for music or art and have spent years of time and thousands of dollars developing it.

Many other women think that their whole duty as wives consists in being model housewives and feeding their husbands. There is never a speck of dust on their floors.

Still other women think that because their husbands found them pretty and attractive and companionable at 20 they will still find them that way at 40, even if they have not added another idea to their repertoire in all that time.

All of which is a grievous mistake. Perhaps in the old days when women had few opportunities of education and were kept more or less in the background, anyhow, men did not expect much of their wives except to be good cooks and rearers of children.

But it does now. A man's wife is an active factor in his success or failure. Many a clever woman who knows how to make friends for her husband and who is popular herself is his biggest asset.

There are no sadder tragedies than those in which the husband outgrows his wife and foolishly is the woman who lets this happen. Every wife who is married to an intelligent, ambitious man should realize that this danger threatens her and she should bend every energy and effort to warding it off by taking time to read and study even if she has to put less hand-work on the baby's clothes and cut out a little fringe.

Dear Dorothy Dix—At 17 I married a man ten years older than myself. He is a good man and treats me kindly, but I have come to loathe him. His very touch makes me shiver. We haven't an idea or thought in common. We quarrel constantly. I have one child. Must I go on

ZORA The Invisible By J. R. WILMOT

"If you've come to me about Sonia," he said, "I can tell you that I've had no occasion to change my mind. When Sonia marries she will do better for herself than a city clerk."

"When I heard that he was dead and that there was something mysterious about it, I didn't know what to think. I thought that perhaps my exciting him had affected his heart, and that I might be held morally responsible. So I sent word down to the office the next morning that I was laid up with a bad cold, and I haven't been outside the door since. That's the truth sir."

"As near as I can tell you it was about three-thirty, but it might have been later."

"And Miss Gaynor came down to see you yesterday afternoon," pursued Blayne. "She has been a frequent visitor of late?"

"That is so," he owned. "Yesterday she came to warn me that the police had been down to see her, and that she had an idea that they might come after me, too."

"So Miss Gaynor has an idea that you might conceivably have murdered her father?"

"Good God, sir, not that! Surely she couldn't believe that?" he cried emotionally.

"You had a perfectly good motive," went on Blayne, relentlessly. "Montgomery Gaynor stood between you and the gratification of your desire. You must admit that things might be made to look very black against you. So far as we know you were the last person to see him before he died. That you had harsh words with him is borne out by the testimony of the clerks in the outer office. That you are subject to a high temper I have myself recently observed. What could be more natural than that, finding yourself thwarted by him, you actually killed him on a sudden impulse. How you killed him is quite another matter. From the police point of view you had sufficient reason for wishing him dead, more reason apparently than anyone else in the world."

this way to the end of my life? Why can't I take my child and go away and make a new beginning? Would not having my boy half the time be better than this fighting for him? What of his memories of his childhood in such a home? I suppose you will say stay for the sake of the child. It is such a mess.

It generally does end in a mess when a girl of 17 get married, because at that age she doesn't know what she wants in a husband nor what sort of woman she is going to be when she grows up and she hasn't the strength and courage and self-control to meet the inevitable trials of matrimony.

Nearly every girl who marries at 17 has lost her taste for her husband by the time she is 25 and resenting being tied down by husband and home and children and having missed all the fun of girlhood.

But there is no real remedy for such a mistake. So far as leaving your husband is concerned, that is a step that nine women out of ten regret after they have made it. Generally it is jumping out of the frying pan into the fire, for they find themselves confronted with difficulties that are worse than an uncongenial husband.

You have never tried making your living. You are trained to trade or profession and if you take your child and go away from your husband and home you will half starve, for you could not get any but the most menial job, and what little you could earn would not go far toward supporting the two of you. Food and clothes and shelter may not seem much to you now when you are letting your mind dwell upon your sentimental grievances, but when you had no roof to cover you and were hungry you would wonder why you ever bothered about such a little thing as whether your husband understood you or not.

No one now advocates a quarrelling wife and husband staying together for the sake of the children. Unless they are willing to sink their differences and control their tongues and tempers and make a peaceful and quiet home for their children, it is far better for them to part. Better Osbert Dwyer sat clutching the arms of his chair as Blayne, in coldly calculating tones, strung together the damning evidence—evidence that was in itself, apart from its circumstantial nature, sufficient to form a very clear and compact case for Scotland Yard to lay before the Public Prosecutor. He felt that in telling the truth he had committed himself to the scaffold.

"But when he spoke the young man was quite calm. "I suppose you will want to arrest me, doctor?" Blayne smiled at what might, by some, have been considered a compliment.

"The law has not yet invested me with powers of arrest," he admitted. "But there is one thing I am going to do before I go, and that is leave you a prescription for a particularly good tonic. I have an idea that you will need it before many more days have passed."

CHAPTER XVI TEMPTATION

Blayne left Mr. Osbert Dwyer gazing into the glowing filaments of the electric fire with eyes that scarcely seemed to be conscious of outward things.

He swung along Gloster Road as if a great load had been suddenly taken from his mind. He felt that at last he had achieved something in this strange case. He had got the truth—or it may be the untruth, he had yet to decide—out of the one man who, in Blayne's mind, at that moment, really mattered.

On the other hand Peter Blayne knew that he must think the problem out carefully. He realised the seriousness of his position—that he virtually held a man's life in the hollow of his hand. It was no wonder that he felt that such a matter could not be decided during a casual walk through the city streets.

He decided, too, that it would be unwise of him to go down to Scotland Yard and communicate the result of his morning's conversation to Inspector Webster. No, he must take the risk of Webster being haul-ed over the coals by his superiors rather than commit himself without serious thought and consideration.

So Blayne decided to lunch at "The Cap'n" on his way and then go around and take out his car. It was an ideal day for a brisk run far away from the petrol-fuming streets of London.

From London Bridge he made his way to Milford and thence along the main road to Hind Head Hill and Lipbrook. Here he turned off to the left towards Hollycombe, and ran the car into a sequestered glade at the side of the road, where it dipped down gently to the wooded land.

The birds were singing lustily—the thrush, the meadow warbler and occasionally the black-bird's shrill notes came floating up from the brook.

for the children to have one parent or no parent at all than two who fight like cats and dogs. Better for the children to have no home than one that is a place of strife.

Psychologists tell us that the children who are brought up in homes where the parents squabble all the time carry the ill effects of their environment through life. They are mentally and spiritually warped and are far more subject to nervous breakdowns than are the children who have fathers and mothers who live amiably and peacefully together and who are brought up in a harmonious home.

It seems so that any woman who loves her children should be willing to forego making snappy comebacks at her husband for the sake of their whole future welfare. DOROTHY DIX.

Dear Miss Dix—I am 26 years old and my husband is 27. We were secretly married in December. I have learned that he is running around with women of bad character. He justifies himself in this by saying that it is his right. I have been raised in a Puritan home with very rigid ideas about marriage and divorce and find it difficult to believe that all men are untrue to their wives, as my husband says they are. I am thinking of getting a divorce, as there is no home or children for us to break up. I am making my own living. Please advise me. DISAPPOINTED.

It is not true that all men are unfaithful to their wives. There are plenty of husbands who are just as true to their wives as their wives are to them. Perhaps every man who really loves his wife is loyal to her. Certainly a husband of a few months' standing cares very little for his wife if he has already begun to roam.

You have little chance of happiness married to such a man. DOROTHY DIX.

A Morning Smile

The conductor and a brakeman on a Montana railroad differ as to the proper pronunciation of the name "Eurelia. You really are!"

Mrs. McKenzie Strongly Recommends Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Worn-out Women

"I was completely worn out from looking after a very cross baby night and day," writes Mrs. James McKenzie, Glenboro, Man. "I became very thin and had several bad spells of dizziness. My legs and back ached, and I was feeling just terrible when I started taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I soon realized I was getting much stronger. I gained in weight, and felt like a new person. I strongly recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

Mrs. McKenzie is but one of thousands of women who have been wonderfully helped by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and who have written in to tell how the rich new blood created by these Pills rebuilt exhausted nervous systems and restored these sufferers to vigorous health.
