BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES
 (By Thornton W. Burgess)

SAFETY FIRST
 Of what avail that which you do if it means loss of life to you?
 —Old Mother Nature.

Mrs. Paddy followed Paddy the Beaver down Laughing Brook where it flows deep in the Green Forest. Paddy said nothing. She said nothing. He knew where they were going. She didn't. Still she asked no questions. It was enough for her that Paddy knew. They have come to an understanding. They were not so they would not be able to accomplish all that they had in mind. Mutual understanding and respect is the necessary foundation for success. A home built on one knows this better than the Beaver folk, the master home in places of the Green Forest. Mrs. Paddy was looking to wonder if Paddy was going to lead her clear down to one of their old open abandoned long ago because all the food trees near it had been cut. He wasn't. They came to a stream flowing into Laughing Brook. Up this Paddy led the way to places it was broad and stony and seemed to hardly more than trickle around and among the stones and pebbles. Then the banks would become steep and near together and there was water enough for swimming. There were places where it was so shallow they waded. There were other places where they went along one bank or the other, whichever offered the easiest going. Still Paddy and Mrs. Paddy said nothing. At long last they came to a place where the stream flowed between low banks through a small, quiet level valley. "This is it," said Paddy.

Mrs. Paddy knew what he meant. Of course. But she had to say something. "Meaning what?" she asked.

"The place where we will make our new home. I think you will agree with me that we can't do better. There is no time to waste looking for a better place."

"If it suits you I will suit me. Food and safety are the two things we need most," said Mrs. Paddy.

Paddy led the way across the level ground to where it began to rise. Mrs. Paddy's eyes sparkled. Scattered here and there, come on the low land and more on the sloping ground, were big and little aspen trees the mark of which would give them plenty of the best they like best in winter. She walked over to a young aspen small enough for her to bite it off with a single bite of her big orange cutting teeth. "My, but this is good!" said she.

Back at the little stream Paddy showed her where they could build a dam. Mrs. Paddy is just as good an engineer as is Paddy. She saw at once that he had chosen just the right place to back up the water into a pond that would bring the water me high enough to the nearest trees for harvesting in a fit, and getting into the water without too much hard work.

"What do you think?" asked Paddy.

"We can build a dam and cut enough food before it is too late, but there won't be time to build a house. Where can we live and be safe?" replied Mrs. Paddy.

"Come with me, my dear," he
