ABUSE

Have you ever thought of it? The VALUE of your eyes. What would you do without them? Probably you would not part with them at any price.

What you may not understand is that abuse and neglect wear the eyes down. Experience shows neglected eyes fail early.

(CHAPTER X

Hartley Madison was running a race with time. His schedule during business hours was always full, and now something had come up about California oil concessions which needed all his attention. He had hoped to be able to attend to the matter by telephone, but had decided he must fly out and look the situation over. The most trusted of his three secretaries was taking charge of all callers and calls in the anti-room of his office and he was dictating to the other two.

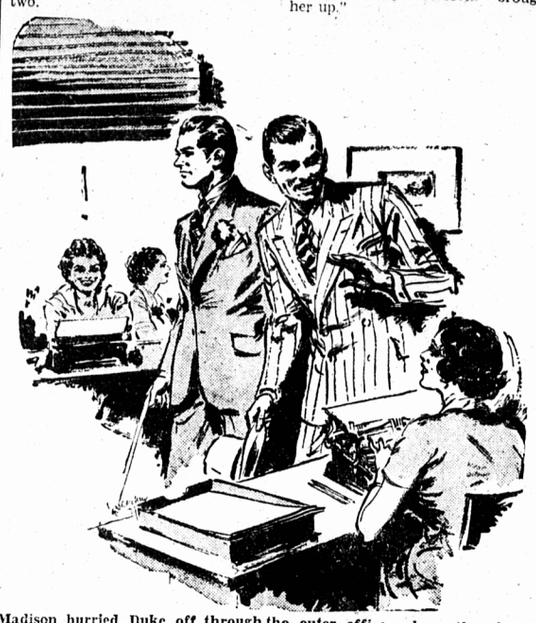
"She said she was fine," he told Duke.

"She says so, of course. And over the telephone, you couldn't see how nervous and irritable and jumpy she is. She doesn't eat enough and Rosetta says she doesn't sleep well—says she has lost eight pounds."

"Has she seen a doctor?"

"Rosetta called one, but she wouldn't see him. Told her she'd discharge her, if she didn't stop butting into her affairs."

Oh, that was just temper," said Madison. Why, Rosetta brought her up."



Madison hurried Duke off through the outer office, where the clerks looked up admiringly.

"Put through a call to Newport," he said over one of his desk phones. "When you get mother, tell her of the change in my plans, so she won't expect me up for the week-end. Bradley? Can't place him. Tell him—oh, he says Brookdale. Tell him I'm sorry, but—"

One of his secretaries had opened the door to go to the outer office. She fell back in amazement, as a young man with a smile said "Thank you so much," and walked into the office.

Madison looked up in surprise.

"Sorry if I seem to barge in," said Duke, but I gathered things were rather frenzied and I have to see you. Mind?"

Madison laughed and held out his left hand, then waved him to a chair. He did not stop talking into the phone.

"Ambassador Sigora calling from Washington? Can't take the time—tell him I've already left for California; will phone him as soon as I land. Find out what United Copper is doing."

He put down the receiver and turned to Duke.

"You're here," he said, but I'm afraid I can't give you much time. . . . I—" his phone rang— 'on a discount of one and a half points, I would advise a purchase of eighty-five thousand. Get that to all the members of the board."

Duke was looking out the window at the magnificent sky-line of New York. He was afraid his face might show what he was thinking. He had known Hartley Madison was powerful in financial circles, but this—keeping ambassadors waiting, giving advice, placing huge orders! Carol had been right when she said if Hartley bet, it would not be with "chicken-feed." Why shouldn't he put some money on the races? Even if he lost what would seem a small fortune to Duke, it wouldn't make a dent in the Madison millions?

'Well, Bradley," said Madison, maybe we can get a few words in. Glad to see you. What are you doing in New York?"

"I came to see you."

I'm flattered. Carol didn't tell me"—again the phone rang—"Of course. That's fine. Close for forty millions."

"Miss Clayton doesn't know I'm here," Duke said when Madison put down the receiver. "Nobody knows I'm here."

"Well, I'm glad to see you. Anything I can do for you?"

"One thing. Come to Florida with me."

Madison shook his head.

"Don't I wish I could! But you've heard some of what's going on. I'm leaving at three by plane for California."

"You'd best have the pilot head it south."

"What do you mean? Were you fibbing just now—did Carol send you?"

"I was telling you God's truth. She'd be furious if she knew I came here, at all. She wouldn't ask me to do anything for her. She never has liked me every time she sees me, she hates me more. I came of my own accord to tell you she needs you."

"Needs me?" there was amazement and fear too in his voice.

"She's a sick girl, Madison—she's in a bad way."

"Why, I talked to her just five minutes before you came in—she wanted to speak to me before she left Baltimore."

"Did she sound all right—natural?"

Madison spoke into the phone before he answered Duke.

"Don't put any call through until I tell you," he said. Not if the president of the Bank of England calls. And I'll ring for you when I need you," he said to the two secretaries in dismissal.

Temper, yes—but that isn't natural, is it? Nothing is right in her life, now."

Do you know if anything is worrying her, Bradley? Oh, of course her father's death was a shock—I know how much she loved him—but I had hoped the excitement of the tracks would be good for her. That was why I agreed to the postponement of our marriage."

Well, if you will pardon me for saying so, you made a mistake there. She needs love and companionship—and except from good old Rosetta, she doesn't get either. I know she insisted on doing this, but she was in no state to know what was best for her, what she really wanted. But I know and I'm telling you—she loves you and wants you and she needs you."

Madison held out his hand to Duke.

I won't forget this, Bradley," he said. I should have had more sense, but as I didn't, I'm glad you had. Wait a minute."

He picked up the receiver.

Send Boswell and Miss Skeen in at once—there's a sudden change in my plans. I have to leave them some further instructions. And you be ready to drive to the airport with me—I'll dictate to you on the way. Now put through a call to Dr. Beard. Get him at once. Then phone the airport and say, I'm going to Florida instead of California; leave at the same time."

He picked up some papers on his desk and glanced at them. He laid them down when the phone rang.

Hello, doctor. I want you to fly to Florida with me this afternoon. Oh, give them to some other doctor. This is urgent. No, I'm all right. It's my financee. I suppose there are good doctors there, but I want the best and won't take anything else. Throw a few things in your bag and pick me up at the office, as soon as you can. Half an hour, O. K. And thanks."

Duke was almost as much impressed by this conversation as he had been with the other things he had heard of Madison. He knew of Dr. Beard. Who didn't? He couldn't resist smiling. He had won out in the matter of Hartley Madison. He would show Carol. He had been sincere in all he had said to Madison. He did like them, he did want them both to be happy, Carol was not well, she did need to have with her, the man she loved. Part of what he had done, he had done for the sake of Jim Clayton. He had asked him, as he was dying, to watch over Carol and be a friend to her if ever she needed one. But there was something else. He wanted to get Madison to betting on the races again. He had made a good beginning. Carol might stymie him yet. But something told him, she wouldn't.

Oh, I forgot one thing," Madison was saying on the phone. You will have to phone the airport again and say there'll be two of us. Dr. Beard is flying down with me. And also let my mother know that—" he stopped as he felt Duke's hand on his shoulder—wait a minute for the rest of the instructions. What are you saying, Bradley?"

I wonder if your arithmetic is perfect. Won't there be two extra going with you?—"

Madison laughed.

Of course, anything you say goes, after what you've done for me today." Then into the phone—I forgot—when you get the airport, say there will be two extra passengers. Mr. Duke Bradley will be with us."

It was time to go. The plane would wait, but Madison could not. He called out last minute orders while he put on his hat and went out the door.

She's just overdone things," he said to Duke, as they went down in the elevator. That's her nature. And I—I'm so in love with her, I've let her have her own way about everything. From now on, I'm going to take charge of things."

Duke has made a daring move. He is determined to get Hartley's bets at any cost. Will Carol find a way to thwart him? See tomorrow's installment with its amazing disclosures.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

SINCERE THANKS

OF THE CANADIAN COMMITTEE OF THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF PARIS

At this moment, as the Central Canadian Committee of the Paris Exhibition of 1937 ends its work and adourns, sine die, its President on behalf of all its members has the agreeable duty and great pleasure of expressing publicly, as a token of respect and gratitude, his sincere thanks to the Canadian newspapers, both of the French and English languages, from coast to coast, which, for over six months, have with infinite kindness and in a highly esteemed spirit of co-operation given to the Canadian Committee of the International Exhibition of Paris 1937 their generous and appreciated support.

The president of the Central Canadian Committee of the International Exhibition of Paris 1937 is also glad to express his gratitude towards the railway companies, navigation companies and travel agencies which have, throughout the whole Canadian territory, shown unceasing zeal and thus permitted the Canadian Committee of the Exhibition, under the most exceptional conditions, to realize entirely its propaganda efforts in favor of the great international manifestation of concord and peace now going on in Paris.
