That Body of Ours

By James W. Baston, M.D.

POINTERS ABOUT THE HEART

You are reading every day about the seriousness of heart ailments and that they stand first as the cause of death.

I have spoken a number of times about heart murmurs, and that although they show that the heart has been damaged at some previous time...

That a heart being simply a pump, that a pump with a leak to it might easily do more work than a pump without a leak...

Of course if you have any obstruction in the nose, and close your mouth tightly when doing the exercise, this will naturally get you out of breath in a short time.

Another point that your doctor will watch closely is the regularity or irregularity of the heart beat.

Generally speaking a rapid irregular heart is not a good heart. However a heart that does not beat too rapidly, but has a slight irregularity which becomes more regular when exercise is taken...

Where there is any swelling of the hands and feet, the feet usually being the first sign, it is fairly certain that the heart is becoming deficient in its work.

An enlarged heart does not necessarily mean a weak heart. So if you are worrying about your heart think of the above points, namely whether or not you get out of breath easily...

Remember also that a heart doesn't get strong by rest, unless there is some acute ailment of the body. So you should take exercise daily under your doctor's supervision...

DAILY LESSONS IN ENGLISH

By W. L. Gordon

WORDS OFTEN MISUSED: Do not say "there is no place like Detroit." Say "no other place."

OFTEN MISPRONOUNCED: agile. Pronounce a-j-il, a as in "at," i as in "ill," not as in "ice."

OFTEN MISSPELLED: frolicsome; no k.

SYNONYMS: separate, sever, detach, disjoint, disconnect, divert.

WORD STUDY: "Use a word three times and it is yours." Let us increase our vocabulary by mastering one word each day.

Today's word: TRANSPARENT; fleeting; brief; momentary. "Mirth is short and transient, cheerfulness fixed and permanent."—Addison.

The Land We Love

The Wilderness Mission Tragedy

Q. What was the Wilderness Mission Tragedy?

A. On March 16, 1649, the tragedy of the Wilderness Mission in the Huron country (between Lake Huron and Lake Simcoe) took place.

The invading Iroquois captured the Jesuit missionaries, Jean Brebeuf and Gabriel Lallemant and tortured them terribly to death.

Brebeuf was of English birth, of the name of Arundel; for fifteen years he had worked among the Hurons, winning many from their sins of "ferocity and intractable indolence."

A man of great gentleness and industry, he died dauntless and defiant to the last, a hero of early Canada.

who enjoyed hearing the sounds of the household as he wrote—to listen to his wife telephoning or to be consulted about 100 every day affairs.

He wanted to be part of life, not remote from it. Of his little granddaughter he said: "A baby should always belong to its grandparents."

"In the long fight with ill health he never yielded an inch without a struggle. Innumerable times when others felt this must be the end, he came back, wrote again, belonged to organizations, entrained his friends, even spoke in public.

And always the infectious of his beautiful voice were things to be remembered. Life must be a more splendid thing to many from witnessing Basil King's courage in meeting it. Truly, a conqueror has passed!"

TO WHAT PORT.

"WHAT port," asked Mr. Bennett, in the course of his speech at Oshawa, "is Mr. King bound for? If he wants to make this an independent country, let him say so."

This question has interested many Canadians. On his return from the Imperial Conference in London two years ago, Mr. MacKenzie King announced with a great flourish of trumpets before and after his arrival that he had secured a new Magna Charta for Canada.

What this new Magna Charta meant nobody knew, it was vaguely hinted that it meant a revision of the British North America Act and a measure of independence for Canada, such as this country never before enjoyed.

The report of the Imperial Conference was never presented to Parliament. The new Magna Charta has never been published but vague hints have been given from time to time regarding the "equal status" of Canada with the Mother Country.

The ridicule heaped upon this meaningless declaration has partly checked the exuberance of Mr. King and certain of his followers, but the vague hints continue regarding the independence and "equal status" for Canada secured by Mr. King while attending the conference.

Mr. Bennett very properly asks, and many other Canadians have asked what does Mr. King mean. What port is he steering for. If he means Canadian independence, let him say so. Canada now wants to know.

Doubtless there are certain people in Canada who may be attracted by this glamor of alleged independence but the great bulk of Canadians have no desire for any other independence than that which they enjoy under the British flag, and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act.

Under the British flag and within the arms of the British Empire Canada enjoys not only perfect independence, but protection. What independence outside of the sheltering arms of Great Britain Canada could enjoy is only the visionary expectation of Communists and malcontents, and to these only Mr. King's vague hints at independence make any appeal.

himself or herself to extract every possible pleasure from life provided it is done with due care to both mental and physical health. There are pleasures which make life worth living; there are also pleasures which make for death.

A WORTHY APPEAL.

MISS BENNETT'S appeal to the young women of Canada in her short address at Sackville the other day should be well noted. She asked the young women to take an interest in National questions. They have the franchise, and the manner in which they use it determines very largely what the future of the country shall be.

An informed democracy is the ideal form of citizenship and will make for ideal governments. To be informed simply means to know what is going on in the public affairs of the country.

Without this knowledge voting by either men or women is little if any short of a crime. The franchise is a sacred thing and should only be exercised intelligently and with a view to National and International good.

In order to use it intelligently we must note the meaning of national and political movements. This is a duty devolving upon all, and it is hoped that Miss Bennett's appeal and example will have the desired effect upon all who hear her appeal during her tour in company with her distinguished brother, the Hon. R. B. Bennett, leader of the Conservative party.

Miss Bennett will be heard in Charlottetown and in other centres of this Province in the very near future. It is hoped that everyone who hears her, and that should mean practically all our people, will take heed to the advice she is giving, to make a study of all public questions so that when the time comes to vote, everyone will know how to vote and why they should vote.

The future of Canada depends upon the intelligence of its people and this intelligence can be cultivated and should be cultivated by all who respect themselves and their country.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The past week has been one of many functions, enjoyable many of them, and more or less successful, but a gloom settles over the summer of 1928 because of regrettable and unfortunate accidents.

We are pleased to note that the City Council has made provision for open air concerts during the remainder of the Summer. It is true some time has been lost, but there were difficulties in the way which the City Council was not able to overcome.

It is gratifying to know that these have been overcome and that we are likely to have some enjoyable concerts at regular intervals during the remainder of the Summer.

The City Council is to be heartily commended on the promptness with which it has tackled the caterpillar problem in the city. Our beautiful trees have been and still are being seriously threatened and unless prompt measures are taken and persisted in, these pests may very easily obtain an advantage which it will be difficult to overtake.

The trees once stripped of their leaves are doomed, and the only preventative is spraying. Much can be done also by placing tarred bands around the trees to prevent the insects from climbing. Private citizens as well as the municipal authorities should interest themselves in this matter, and do what they can to save the human contacts. He was an author

"In the time I have known Mr. King he has never been outside the shadow of ill health, yet I have the keenest impression of his vitality. I see him walking briskly down Washington street, with never a hint in his carriage of the "little light" which guided his steps, chatting in a bookstore, presiding at a meeting of the Boston Authors' club, or in his study—that lovely, high room looking down on the peaceful shades of old Cambridge—so eagerly interested in everything to do with books, so keen in his comments, so delightful and unexpected in his humor.

I saw him once so ill that two nurses were needed but an invalid's table was before his chair and he was writing an article as his strength served. His body might fall but his spirit never did! Despite everything he found a strong, enduring joy in living.

"All the world knows Basil King, the author, for it is close to 20 years since 'The Inner Shrine' vindicated Henry Mills Alden's belief that ever so often an anonymous novel made a tremendous success and then was just about the time. I wonder how many readers realize how little he ceased to be the clergyman when he became the writer.

The religion he taught often was that of courage and helpfulness and joy, but he could no more forget to be a spiritual adviser than he could forgo his allegiance to the lovely Canadian island where he was born. In becoming a writer he merely gathered to himself larger congregations.

"He was through all his days a conqueror of circumstances. I see him as indomitable, a man who was acquainted with adversity but who could not be vanquished. His courage was a gay, fine thing which made both life and death more comprehensible. He loved living and the human contacts. He was an author
