Girl Ferry Pilot Now Taxi Driver

BY ANITA FREEDMAN Canadian Press Staff Writer TORONTO, May 29 - (CP) - Her Air Transport Auxiliary history sheet describes her as a "first class officer, keen, steady pilot and cheerful personality" but Helen Harrison is a bomber as co-pilot.

The first Canadian girl to ferry military aircraft in the British Isles for the A.T.A. Vancouver-born Helen is at her parents' home here and has decided to return to England in the fall, she has managed in rather oblique fashion to stay near flying fields and the air activity she loves. She now works as a taxi-driver for a company transporting passengers to nearby Malton airport.

As an A.T.A. first officer, roughly equivalent to a flight lieutenant, she flew single and twin engine aircraft including Spitfires, Mosquitos, Mustangs and Boston, from factory to base.

"At first I thought what a thrill it would be to fly a Spitfire but when you ferry three or four of them in a day the glamor wears off," she said. Her favorite aircraft is the Mosquito bomber. "It's smooth, light, easy to handle yet powerful," she explained.

Flying an old nose-heavy Lusander from which too much ballast had been removed, she had her only air accident when she was forced to crash-land. "I just saved them the job for it was about to be broken up," she smiled, "but I admit I was scared." Though bruised and shaken she was up in the air again next day.

SAM MORSE RELATIVE DOES NOT KNOW CODE ARLINGTON, Va., May 30 - (CP) - Lella Morse, the energetic 66-year-old granddaughter of Samuel F. Morse, inventor of the telegraph, does a full-time job for the United States Army Signal Corps at Arlington, Va. But she admits she doesn't comprehend the dot and dash of the Morse code. Her actual duties are a military secret.

None of the five living Morse grandchildren knows the code, believes, though like Grandfather Samuel, who sculptured, painted and founded the American Academy of Design, they inherit a creativeness - usually for painting and music.
