BY Elizabeth Corbett

Ted's letter had arrived by the afternoon mail. Elsa knew it by heart long before she had arrived for her to dress and descend to the dinner table at which she always presided in such state.

Baron Gottlieb sat at her right hand, the Countess Van Urk at her left. Behind each of those three chairs stood a servant in a uniform as close to the Leucadian royal livery as an American firm could come. Candles a yard long, of which no more than a first inch or two was ever consumed here in the dining room, shone down on flowers and damask and silver.

At the table Elsa talked a little almost always to the countess. Now and then she was constrained to fling a word at the baron. He answered her almost at random, from the fastnesses of a brooding silence. At any rate she was free nowadays from his attempts to be sociable; there were no more dominoes in the evening, and he commonly spoke to her only when he had to.

But tonight the baron was in a better humor. The news from Leucadia had been good today. He gave the bulletins of another fort seized, of Colonel Thoma of the loyalist General Staff on his way to America to arrange details for securing further aid.

These reports jarred bitterly on Elsa's mood. Leaving her dessert untasted, she sprang to her feet and started for the door. Reluctantly but in good order, the countess followed her. By the time they reached the door the two young attaches were in position for the queen to pass between them.

But heavy footsteps followed her tonight. In the hall the baron caught up with her and begged, "A moment, Your Highness. If I might talk to you just a little."

"Certainly Baron. Shall we go in here?" Elsa led the way to the long drawingroom, but she did not sit down.

The baron was, for him, strangely embarrassed. "I feel a certain tension, Highness, when I try to talk to you. It is not easy even if what I have to say were more welcome."

"Oh, tension!" Elsa shrugged. "All our nerves are on edge. How could they help being? Take those two young officers, for instance, Sterndorf and Kopfberg; they left everything to follow me to America. Do you realize that now neither of them knows what has become of his own family or of the house where he was born and brought up?"

"That is the price they pay for their position, Highness. It is the price they undertook to pay when they entered your service."

"If I were allowed the slightest choice in the matter Baron, I should not accept such costly devotion."

He drew a sharp breath. "Costly? Your Highness is still smarting about the way your money was used?"

"Oh, my money! It was never my money in any real sense of the word if I had earned a single spence of it—I wonder what it feels like to earn the money that buys your daily bread and keeps a roof to shelter you from the rain. It must be a wonderful feeling, Baron. Earned money, and earned position!"

"That way of thinking and feeling the baron could not comprehend, nor even guess at, he saw in it only one reproach the more. After all, how could he justify himself in words, if his services did not speak for him? He kissed her hand ceremoniously and withdrew in the manner of a dismissed courtier.

CHAPTER XVII
Elsa was disturbed in the morning while she was still deep in dreams. At her bedside stood the Countess Van Urk, wringing her hands and sobbing as if she had never had the advantages of an English upbringing and a long training in the Leucadian court.

Elsa started up in bed. "What's the matter? Has something terrible happened? There sit down and don't try to talk. Polynka! Polynka! Get the countess a glass of water."

The countess waved the water away, and sobbed on inarticulately over her bent head Elsa caught the maid's eye. "You know what it is that has upset the countess? Is somebody sick? Or—dead?" demanded Elsa.

"Yes, Your Highness. 'Not—not Baron Gottlieb?' He was the oldest of the party, for that reason Elsa thought of him first. But he was also the most enduring; she was not prepared to find her guess justified.

"Yes, Your Highness. He was found dead in bed this morning when his valet went to call him. Elsa was horrified. If she had only been a little kinder to him last night! Yet how could she be kind, when her very kindness would have been so terribly false? The baron's death was in all the afternoon papers. Elsa studied them with anxious eyes and an aching heart.

"Toward evening, indeed her remorse began to be tinged with hope. Surely this bitter business overseas need not go on now that the baron was no longer here to direct it! Surely the counterrevolution—so desperate a business for an unworthy end—could now be called off.

At a late conference that evening her impetuous hope deserted her. Her loyal party all felt alike that the cause for which the baron had died must draw fresh vigor from this crowning proof of his sincerity.

LADY CRIPPS

The Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster and the Moderator of the Church of Scotland all agreed to co-operate and on April 23rd of this year a big meeting was held in the Albert Hall, London, to bring a Christian approach behind the idea of Western Union and these church representatives sat on the platform in support. Representatives of Western European countries came over to speak. Lord Halifax took the Chair and my husband spoke, in his private capacity.

This particular meeting centered on a special purpose that we were deeply anxious that the Eastern countries should not feel excluded and representatives of China, India, Pakistan and West Africa joined those on the platform. Members of almost every Christian denomination were there and this meeting has had wide repercussions.

A month later there was a "follow up" of those specially concerned with and touching many, different sides of life and still another meeting was held in July.

The potentialities which are showing themselves are very great and we went to go forward with deep thought giving our best to trying to bring about a Unity of Christian Action in permeating national and international life. We have far to go but I believe a good beginning has been made.

It is this Action which will appeal to youth. I feel convinced that we have got to find some common ground on which people can work together for Service, without feeling diagonal to their own denominations or political affiliations. Young people especially respond to this approach. They are impatient with quarrels and rigidity when they see around them the results of disunity which is in itself unchristian.

I have tried to give you a bird's eye view of some aspects of the present day Britain, and as I said at the beginning, it is so full of inspiration. We have our ups and downs but I speak of one thing with conviction. Never has the underlying quality of spirit been stronger in the things which really matter.

It is as if the people of Great Britain had shaken off a cloak of despondency and regained belief in themselves. With this spirit
