RACING DRIVER

By Alexander Campbell

Only that morning he had seen her—and she had been looking white and miserable. He would have word with the pair of them—Florence and Rupert. Florence's behaviour astonished him. He had not thought her that sort of a girl. An explanation was obviously required. But first he would have a talk with Christine.

He seized the first opportunity, when they were back in town, to draw her aside.

"Christine," he said, "if you think you can drag yourself away from your professor for half-an-hour, I'd like to talk to you."

Christine glanced at him sharply. Do you think I'd have suggested it myself, but I thought you'd be too busy with the car—

"Oh, hang the car!" said Frank, and his aunt raised an eyebrow. When Frank said that, there was something wrong in his eye.

"Well, until I get my hat," she said. "Then you can take me to the beach."

WHO LOVES WHOM?

They drove in the strong South African sunshine to the sea front. Frank parked the car facing the sea. A cool breeze blew in their faces. Below them scarlet flowers bloomed amid pleasant green foliage. Beyond the garden the sands were dotted with multi-coloured sun umbrellas. Bathers splashed in the surf.

Christine sighed luxuriously. "This is divine! At home, winter is the way here's treating Dorothy."

"Yes, very nice," said Frank mechanically. "Christine, I want to talk to you about this infernal business."

"What infernal business?"

"Oh, you know!" said Frank irritably. "This fellow Featherstone—the way he's treating Dorothy."

"Ah!" said Christine. "So that's it!"

She paused. "Frank, let things take their course!"

"But he's making her utterly miserable! I can't stand by and watch—"

"Are you sure that Dorothy cares?"

"Oh, that's only a pose," said Frank. "Of course she won't admit it, after imputation of any sort. But she hates emotion of any sort. But she's hurting her—"

"Rubbish!" said Christine briskly. "It isn't rubbish! Can't you see how worried and distressed she's looking? What I can't understand, is that Frank is now Florence, who I'd thought was a thoroughly decent kid could—"

"Poor Florence!" Christine sighed. "She's succumbed to her aim—and now she's sorry."

"What aim?"

"I can tell you the whole story," said Christine. "I haven't been talking about with my eyes shut these last few months. She decided that Rupert needed to be cured of being such a frightful prig. You will have noticed that Rupert has been at Dorothy's expense," said Frank grimly.

"No," said Christine. "If you're as blind as that, it's hopeless. Dorothy is worried about Rupert?"

"Certainly she is!"

"I'll learn," said Christine. "And most engaged to Dorothy. Rupert needed to be cured of being such a frightful prig. You will have noticed that Rupert has been at Dorothy's expense," said Frank grimly.

"No," said Christine. "If you're as blind as that, it's hopeless. Dorothy is worried about Rupert?"

"Certainly she is!"

"I'll learn," said Christine. "And most engaged to Dorothy. Rupert needed to be cured of being such a frightful prig. You will have noticed that Rupert has been at Dorothy's expense," said Frank grimly.

LAWRENCE PETERS

A sad gloom was passed over the whole countryside when they learned of the passing of the late Lawrence Peters of North Rustico at the early age of 52 years. Although taken suddenly ill on the 8th of June he was rushed by ambulance to the Charlottetown Hospital where the Doctors performed an emergency operation which was of no avail. And his spirit took flight to the God who gave it on the 14th. The late Lawrence Peters was ordained by the Doctors performed an emergency operation which was of no avail.
