"Jealous Hearts" By MILDRED BARBOUR THE NEW MILLICENT

Millicent stood on the veranda of a pretty Spanish villa and looked across the waters of the Sound, sparkling blue and clear in the sunlight of an August morning, to the soft mauve that was the Connecticut shore.

The veranda was a charming place of rose-flagged floor; of slender, fluted white columns; of painted furniture, softened with gay, rose-silk cushions; of hanging baskets, filled with flowering plants and vines.

Millicent herself was a harmonious part of the ensemble. She wore a rose-colored negligee—a lovely thing of chiffon and lace, with a gleam of silver under its diaphanous folds.

It was scarcely two months since she had leased this Long Island villa from owners who were leaving to shoot big game in Africa.

"I think I'll buy it, if the people will sell," she decided calmly, and shut from her thoughts the memory of Carver Hall and Lynnwood, their smother and priceless mahoganies; their old-fashioned gardens and fragrant hedges. "A Spanish villa is more in keeping with my new personality."

On this August morning, however, she deliberately let her thoughts wing southward, and she smiled bitterly when they reminded her that a year had passed to the day, since the wreck of her happiness.

Twelve months ago she stepped, all unwarned, into the rose-arbor at Lynnwood and had seen her husband holding Elinor in his arms. "And tonight!" laughed Millicent.

"There's nothing to do about Tony. He leads his life," she made a brief, expressive gesture, "and I lead mine."

After a moment, Millicent said softly: "He was once—my friend." He looked at her quickly. "Millicent—who was the woman?" She started. In spite of herself, a bit of deepening crease crept into her cheeks.

"What woman?" she asked quietly. "The woman who came between you and Tony. I don't deny it! You've never told me anything, but I know some things. I know, for instance, that you were very much in love with Tony when I first met you. I'd have sworn then that softly, recalling the agony that sight had caused her. "I shall dance till dawn. Tony's having a good time. Why shouldn't I?"

A masculine voice from the terrace cut in on her reverie. "What are you chuckling about—all by yourself? Tell a chap the joke, won't you?"

Millicent looked down at Peterson, immaculate in flannels. He was spending his vacation with his sister and brother-in-law, the owners of the adjoining place. It was through them that Millicent had found the Spanish villa that was her challenge to Life and the badge of her rebellion against a love that had chained her and hurt her.

Her eyes, like soft brown velvet, smiled at him, but she said plainly: "Go away! I detest men before lunch!"

He swung himself up on the broad rail of the veranda and sat there, smiling back at her. "It seems to me that it's always 'before lunch' with you," he remarked despondently. "Honestly, Millicent, isn't there any chap you like the least bit?"

"Not a single one in all the world!" she declared gaily. But she didn't look at him. She was pinning dried leaves from a plant in the basket above her head.

Peterson lit a cigarette and smoked for a time in silence. "See here," he broke out suddenly, "what are you going to do about Tony?"

She lifted her exquisitely arched brows. "There's nothing to do about Tony. He leads his life," she made a brief, expressive gesture, "and I lead mine."

After a moment, Millicent said softly: "He was once—my friend." He looked at her quickly. "Millicent—who was the woman?" She started. In spite of herself, a bit of deepening crease crept into her cheeks.

"What woman?" she asked quietly. "The woman who came between you and Tony. I don't deny it! You've never told me anything, but I know some things. I know, for instance, that you were very much in love with Tony when I first met you. I'd have sworn then that you'd stick to him forever. And here you are, living alone and—well, pretty much going the pace with one of the gayest sets on Long Island. You know that's true, Millicent," he said, when she opened her mouth to protest.

"Perhaps," she shrugged, good-humoredly, apparently having decided not to take offense. "It was this very fact that worried Peterson. So few things seemed to shock or offend Millicent these days. Whatever happened, she laughed and brushed it aside. She was restless, eager for pleasure; she was like a butterfly, flitting purposelessly through a sunny afternoon, with no thought of the inevitable storm."

She saw his frown and said, with a careless shrug. "Why should I make a recluse of myself, just because I'm married. Tony is enjoying himself in Europe."

"Is he, I wonder?" muttered Peterson. Millicent's smile struck him as peculiar. "He didn't know, of course," thought Millicent, had just received a letter from Elinor, written on the morning after her music-hall debut. She said, among other things: "Tony and I had a row after the performance, and he went off in a huff. He had the face to say that my debut was cheap. It made me furious. But, of course, he'll be around today with orchids and apologies."

Peterson asked slowly: "When is Tony coming back?" "How should I know?" laughed Millicent, and added: "Do you realize that you're painfully unflattering? You come for a tete-a-tete with a lady and then talk of nothing but her absent husband!" Peterson was staring at her somberly.

"He'll find you very much changed." "For better or for worse?" she demanded audaciously. "I'm hanged if I know," he muttered. "You're like a blow between the eyes—you simply knock a fellow out. But—well, I was very fond of the old Millicent."

"Too?" she queried audaciously. "Too?" he echoed, puzzled. He caught at her hand. "See here, Millicent, what are you trying to do?"

For an instant, they stared at each other, both a little flushed. When they glanced up, Tony was standing at the foot of the steps, regarding them gravely. "So," thought Millicent, with a curious clarity, "because he has quarreled with Elinor, he has come home!" (To Be Continued.)
