ELLEN'S DIARY

city hospital. Rob took advantage of his increased help to turn the younger cattle to their permanent pasture at the other farm. Jock too decided "ours may as well go too" and I soon lost him and his father herding ours on the first lap of the journey across the fields on the way to join those of Rob's. Jamie, his face red from his exertions so James said wielding a small switch walked alongside the other men. "As usual" Karolyn told me "I took the broom" which James is pleased to term "a woman's weapon" and by their combined efforts, the herd of young ones were soon safely in the summer pasture. "The fat ones will be taken there" James said "if we have time, some day next week."

* * *

This week about to take its departure has given Island folk a taste of Summer weather, even if the seed-time is only at hand. It offered many delightful, sun-filled hours in which farm-folk could go buoyantly to their out of door labors, in field or garden. Our garden Jeanie and I made ready for the planting and now that I think of it we planted an early vegetable Cow-slips came into profuse bloom along the mill stream and a daffodil blossomed in a border. We discovered, quite by accident, a nest wonderfully and artistically fashioned in the very heart of the old Rowan tree in the lawn border. Jamie admiring it, clasps his hands tightly, behind his back, the better to resist the temptation to handle the precious fragile eggs. Each member of the family and many of the visitors to Alderlea are taken there to view the wonder of it. Jamie himself was an overnight guest this week—the night a promising heifer took sick and he watched intently and I held a dim lantern while the men administered a curing drench.

* * *

The fencing, which has occupied considerable time was finally completed and in the peace and security which attends its close the teams were hitched and work began in the fields. At a moderate pace, at first, but leading up to a period when in the heart of the cropping days will be lengthy and labor strenuous both for men and beasts. Cattle browse daily on the pastures, but as yet, no cattle have come back to the neighboring hills. The lovely bars of Pat's making are idle and have weathered prettily through the year. Mr. D our late carpenter from down the driver and another, a farmer with whom James compared many notes on seasonal work purchased one of our lessening number of small pigs. Contrary to established procedure, "We're not going to keep any to fatten this Summer," as James remarked to Mr. C when they chatted this evening in the kitchen. But the matrons are being kept: the old one, who, for Jamie's amusement, stands on her hind legs with ease and regards him over the sty; her daughter as well, having proved an enviable record of performance in raising small fry and "that one Ellen? She's the one we got from Rob! I declare some farmers' wives shouldn't be farmers' wives at all —they have not one iota of interest in the place—not to know about their own pigs!" These three have been given the run of the paddock —beringed of course but not without loud vocal protest and neither on their fingers nor in their ears.

* * *

This week brought a return of the delightful twenty-fourth and nieces Ellen and Ann—a teacher— to Alderlea for the holiday. And now work or play is suspended until the first of the week. Outdoors, implements are idle, harness hung on stable pegs; indoors the Saturday night order and content prevails. When I went in the starlight awhile since to the house across the lane for I wanted to return a plate which had carried us a delicious pie (rhubarb and bananas, Mm!) I stopped by the door, for Jeanie was singing and not for worlds would I have interrupted her song It was a lovely melody, though she only hummed the refrain. It was, I thought delightful to hear and later I came away without entering. It was

"a deep tune, a dear tune—like a lullaby;
The little leaves were listening beneath a bending sky.
A sweet song, a slow song—I held my breath to hear;
And all the night was hearkening, and all the stars came near.
Meadow larks, and church tunes, the tricks that fiddlers learn;
There's a lot of music to make a man turn.
But there's naught can equal, when all's said and spent,
A woman's low singing in a cottage of content.

Until Monday. . . Diary. . . .
Good-night. . .

RACING DRIVER

After he had gone Reddy gazed sadly at the closed door. "Women!" he said bitterly. He had a feeling that technical chats about acceleration—which was Reddy's idea of a 'yarn' with anybody also 'on the job'—would be strictly limited this voyage. Still, that Stewart seemed a nice chap; and there was a young passenger to whom Reddy as one of the big race men, was already an idol. Reddy had promised to get Frank's autograph for him. Life had its compensations.
