Dickey's Home Run In 6th Is Payoff Blow As Yankees Capture Title

By JUDSON BAILEY Associated Press Staff Writer... Dickey's home run in the sixth inning was the payoff blow that secured the Yankees' victory in the seventh game of the World Series.

It was a mighty blow to climax the glorious career of Dickey, who has been on nine Yankee squares in the World Series starting as a rookie in 1928, and it helped Chandler, the 34-year-old dean of New York's mound staff, to his second success of the Series.

By CHARLES DUNKLEY Associated Press Staff Writer... The Yankees also made several gestures at Cooper and his successors on the mound, lefty Max Lanier and Murray Dickson, the right-hander who was given leave from the Series after he had been supposed to enter military service a week before the series started.

Joe Gordon grounded out to end this business, but the Yankees were right back in the next frame pressing for the run. With three outs, Crosetti and Bud Metheny hit successively and Cooper tried to catch the runner off first, but he failed.

Bill Dickey, whose sixth-inning at bat ended the series, pitched the seventh, putting a runner with a walk, before being removed for the pinch batter in the last half of the inning.
