INSIDIOUS EYE STRAIN

We use this adjective advisedly. Sufferers from Eyestrain may have perfect vision and therefore do not suspect the presence of any eye defect.

The motive power of the entire human organism is Nerve Energy.

Normal eyes, it is computed utilize about 20% of this Nerve Energy, but when Eyestrain is present, a much larger proportion is required. Hence defective eyes, through their consumption of an excessive amount of Nerve Energy may seriously affect the functioning of other organs of the body and produce ill health.

SONIA By VIDA HURST

Day was breaking when Sonia opened her eyes. She looked for Maxine's blond braid on the pillow beside her. Then she realized, with sweeping bitterness, that she would never see it again. It was the morning she had hoped to see the sunrise with Franklin. Where was Franklin? Was he, too, sleepless with remorse, facing a gray dawn? and Mac? Sonia shuddered. She pictured him, more considerate than usual, a model husband, passing Sunday with his family. How furtively he would scan the papers for an account of the accident! While Maxine lay dead, accusing but forever silent! "It isn't fair," thought Sonia bitterly.

She lay listening to the sounds about her. The padded noises of a hospital! The subdued clang of elevators, smothered bits of conversation, smooth-rolling carts on rubber tires—all the business pertaining to illness and death! Emotionless save for the frantic grieving of some novice at suffering, called upon to face bereavement for the first time. The nurse entered for early temperatures. Her professional cheerfulness grated upon Sonia. Later came an unappetizing tray. Sonia drank the hot coffee and pushed the tray away.

The conviction grew upon her that she must get away. She would be really ill if she were forced to remain. Long before time for Don to return she began watching the door, listening for steps which might be his. This wrist watch which Franklin had given her had been shattered in the accident. She was compelled to guess at the hour.

When Don's lean, dark figure appeared, she could have cried with relief. "How are you, Sonia?" "I'm all right. Only I can't endure staying here. Please, Don, make them let me go home."

He held her wrist, counting the pulse, with unusual rapidity. When he had finished he held his hand, pleadingly over hers. "Don't leave me here any longer. I'll be ever so much better if I can get up. It's lying here makes me so nervous."

"It's the shock that has made you nervous," he corrected, gently. "I think you can leave to-morrow. Where will you go?" For the first time it occurred to her that she must return to rooms haunted by memories of Maxine.

"I can't go to the apartment." "Don't you think you had better go home for a little while?" Bewildered as she undoubtedly was, his question astounded her. "Back to Muncie?" "Back to your mother and father."

But she refused. "They'd drive me mad with questions. How did it happen? What were you doing out with these men?" He smiled at her wistfully. "You haven't had enough excitement yet?"

"I never want another thrill as long as I live," she said petulantly. "But neither can I endure the life at home."

He said then: "Your sister Vera has another baby. A boy this time." "I'm glad it's over. You talked with mother?" "Yes. I tried not to alarm her. And I promised you would call her yourself to-morrow."

"That's fine. You're such a peach. You remember I told you I'd call on you if I got into trouble?" "I remember." "I didn't dream I'd have to call so soon."

She saw the color mounting in his cheeks. "Sonia, if you're feeling up to it, I'd like to talk to you. Her smile was mischievous. "You mean preach?" "No, indeed," he replied, with decision. "I have nothing to preach about. This is as much my fault as yours."

Her green eyes widened with surprise. "I fail to see where you come into the picture at all, Don." "Well, I do. It was I who insisted upon your coming to Chicago."

"I had decided to come long before you suggested it." "Perhaps you had, but how much chance did you have of coming without the position I hastened to secure for you? Without my rather impertinent interceding with your parents?"

His voice was so bitter she did not attempt to reply. "I felt like a dog calling them up to tell them you had been in an accident. I meant well, but I was all wrong. You should have stayed at home." "Don't think for a moment that I would. Eventually I should have reached Chicago without any one's help."

"You're too young. My idea was to get you away from Muncie. But it was a mistake. Whatever has happened I am partly responsible for it."

Sonia half rose from her flat smooth pillows. "It's ridiculous of you to feel that way. I'll shoulder the blame for my own mistakes, thank you. Besides, what can either of us do about it now?"

His brown eyes stared at her hungrily, as if they were begging more than his lips could voice. "You laughed at me Sunday and I swore I'd never mention it again, but every resolution I'd make was jarred by this accident. Sonia, it ab-might have been you. Won't you tell me if you love me now?" She was touched by the honest passion of his words. Yet he would have gone away without seeing her again. He had come only because she had sent for him. Oh, but he was strong. Unbreakable. Like a stone wall!

"Won't you answer me?" She sighed. "What can I say? I think you are the best man I ever knew?" "But you don't love me?" She could not bring herself to an open denial. She was surprised to find so much affection pleading for him.

"Supposing I do?" she faltered. Light swept over his countenance, lending it a sudden, magnetic beauty. "If you do, dear, our problem is solved."

"How do you mean?" He held her fluttering, restless hands in both of his. "You can go to Berlin with me. You need never face anything alone again."

She longed to put her tortured, aching heart beyond the reach of further wounds. Don could protect her. He could keep things from hurting. But Franklin's sweet, reproachful eyes, his lips, hurt and wistful, pushed between them.

"I wish I could," said she. "But I'm afraid it might not be fair." "Why wouldn't it?" "I'm still young and silly, you know. I should be sure to get into trouble of some kind."

"I wouldn't give you a chance. I don't feel as if I would ever take another chance of any kind," she admitted. "But oh, Don, I can't promise. I wish you'd make me marry you? It would be the best thing that ever happened to me."

He answered grimly: "I'm no cave man, Sonia. If you marry me it will have to be because you really want to." But the idea of making another decision frightened her. She was still so weak. So shattered mentally! As if her will had been broken into bits.

When he rose to leave her she clung to him, crying: "Don't go!" "I must, dear. I'll be back to-morrow."

"May I leave then?" "Yes, and in the meantime you must make up your mind where you want to go." "But I can't go back to the apartment..." He was very patient with her. "That's nerves, dear. But my advice is for you to go home." (To Be Continued.)

COUGHS AND COLDS DREADED BY MOTHERS

What a weight of responsibility rests on the mother of the family during the cold weather season. In every cough and cold she seems to hear the warning of serious developments. She reads croup, bronchitis, pneumonia and consumption and realizes that these are the natural results of neglected colds. But Dr. Chase has provided a prompt relief for coughs and colds and a preventive of more serious ailments of throat and lungs, in his Syrup of Linseed and Turpentine. This medicine is so well-known that only a reminder is necessary to most people to recall its effectiveness in relieving croup, bronchitis, asthma and all forms of throat and bronchial troubles.
