Fortune's Apprentice
BY Leonard Leslie

Next day John met Joan Barton. "I heard Diana Sandley is home," she said, watching him with eyes wide open, her head tilted slightly to one side. She looked pert. "Yes!" John answered. "I saw her."

"Really? You didn't lose much time, considering she did not arrive until yesterday morning."

"On the ten to the train, to be precise. I happened to be passing that way as she was walking home."

"Then you didn't know she was coming?"

"Of course not. It was a surprise. Why should she tell me?"

"I wouldn't know," Joan said slantly.

John wondered if everyone in the neighbourhood was aware of his secret. Well, not exactly a secret. How could it be that when there was only a rather close friendship involved? John quizzed him as though she knew his innermost feelings.

Yes, there was no doubt about it. He was trying to deceive himself again, and there is no more difficult person than oneself with whom to have no doubts. The Admiral and Mrs. Sandley thought that to justify their intervention, Philippa was on the side of her sister and an out-and-out supporter of a romantic association that her sister had tried to act as matchmaker, and so had Lady Eldrick.

So what further use was there in pretending when so many knew it. For he was sorely tempted to barge straight in and say, "I love you. Will you marry me?" and he was well aware that her answer would be "Yes."

Then the battle would be joined, and it would be fierce. Against him would be ranged the serried ranks of the Sandley clan, less Philippa. Beside the family, as many of their well-connected friends as could be dragged in to reinforce the Sandley line.

John was too modest to see that the Admiral would not have it all his own way, even with the county before him. He had not learned how to fight in certain quarters, in which he had expected no such esteem. All he could imagine as standing at his side were Sir Charles, Edward and many of the villagers. What attitude his parents would take up, he was not then sure.

Boys, he decided to put the whole matter fairly and squarely before his mother.

"It beats me, lad," she acknowledged. "Not that I haven't been looking for something of the kind this past few months. Now you ask me I'd say that the first and foremost comes your happiness and that of the young lady. You say she is his girl?"

"So I think."

"May be she is. I've got to know quite a bit about her since that day you dumfounded me by bringing her in to tea. There's nothing stuck-up about her, either. But you go to remember me and your Pa. We're what we are."

"Good enough for anybody, mother."

"In a manner of speaking, yes. The trouble is that we live in one style while others live in another."

"You do make it seem as if there was something to be ashamed of."

"Don't you think that. That's the point. It matters what those you move amongst think, doesn't it?"

"Not very much."

"There are some times when it might. Although none has a better right to advise you, I'm afraid, for the best, and with our blessing, I'll go so far as to say that what might have been awkward in my young day doesn't seem to matter to you much any longer. Point is, you'll be living here among those you were born and bred with and that'll make it needful to watch your step."

"Mary the less," said his father bluntly. "We'll not shame you. If it makes any difference, there is no call for you to be mixed up with us afterwards."

"If Diana were the type of girl who would urge that she would have no interest for me," John reported.

"Mrs. Morris said: 'My view is that you youngsters are all right, though the older ones can make themselves an awful nuisance whether it is us or the Admiral and his misters. There's one thing, she'll not be marrying you for your money.'

"Nor I for hers."

His mother looked at him shrewdly. "Reckon you'll make enough for both," she conceded. "Not that money's everything. Often it doesn't enter into things at all."

Before the week was out Admiral Sandley presented himself in person at John's office.

"More private here," he pronounced, clearing his throat nervously.

"Hope you don't mind my popping in for a chat?"

"This was uncomfortably reminiscent of Conrad's opening gambit on a previous occasion."

"Carry on," John invited.

"This was something new. Evidently the Admiral was still a sufficiently good fighting man to adopt surprise tactics."

"They have an opening for a smart man."

"I think it can be safely said that the sugar supply position is the most difficult situation we have to face today in any rationed commodity. You can't get all you want in wartime. If one pound will do, don't buy two."

The sugar situation is NOT sweet

FOUR-FIFTHS OF THE SUGAR CANADA CONSUMES HAS TO BE IMPORTED

This map shows where Canada, Great Britain and the United States got their sugar in the good old days of peace. Our three countries take practically all the exportable sugar from these major sugar-exporting areas.

But supplies have either been cut off by enemy occupation of the country—as in the case of Java and the Philippines, or their production radically reduced by shortage of workers, as in the case of Hawaii, Porto Rico, Australia, Trinidad, Fiji.

Even the production of beet sugar in Canada and the United States has been drastically cut by labour shortage. In both countries the '43 sugar beet crop was forty per cent less than in '41. The only country to show an important increase is Cuba, where output had for years been deliberately restricted. But its increase has not been sufficient to offset the losses elsewhere—let alone meet the increased demand.

ROLLING ON SUGAR

The war has brought some unusual demands on the United Nations' sugar pool. Vast quantities have been taken for making industrial alcohol used in the manufacture of synthetic rubber (tires, etc.) as well as T.N.T. and smokeless powder. For instance, the explosive to fill five 16-inch shells requires as much sugar as is produced on an acre of the finest sugar land. This year Cuban sugar alone used for making industrial alcohol will equal Canada's normal sugar imports for more than two years.

DO WE NEED MORE SUGAR?

A century ago the whole world didn't consume as much sugar as Canada does today. Our sweet tooth has been acquired in quite recent times. Sugar rates high for its energy value, but starchy food is a good substitute.

WE'RE LIVING ON OUR SUGAR CAPITAL

At the time of "Pearl Harbour" the United Nations had a reserve stock-pile of about 3 million tons, but for the last 3 years we've been using more than has been produced—and dipping heavily into "reserve." Liberated nations will have to dip in too. Extra good crops could improve the situation, but greatly increased supplies are not in sight. If current consumption keeps up, we could be very short of sugar next year. We must do the utmost to conserve our supplies.

RATIONING WAS STARTED BECAUSE OF SHORTAGE OF SHIPS
IT MUST BE CONTINUED BECAUSE WORLD STOCKS ARE DEFICIENT
