THE THIRD WARNING

A WARNING
Smith, tugging his short, pointed beard, his wide brown eyes lighting up. "It's James," he said. "He insists. I'm a simple sort of bloke myself—a crust on the hillside—and I'm happy. But James is an artist on food, and he practices his effects on me."

"I congratulate you on having such a man. Talking of artists reminds me of that artist-fellow Seymore."
"Ah," cried Smith, "two minds with a single thought! I was just about to mention his name. We spoke of him yesterday. Did you say you knew him well?"

"I haven't known him long of course," I replied; "but I've seen a fair amount of him in the time. I don't remember whether you said he was a pal of yours or not, but—"

"Not at all," put in Smith. "By no means. He's dropped in here about a dozen times all told in the last year or so. That's about all. I was quite taken with the man, and he's got some interesting yarns about the East. But he doesn't seem to want to be—what shall I say?—mated. I can't quite make him out, and haven't tried to. But I'm sorry—I interrupted you."

"No; I was only going to ask if you knew anything about the man. I thought you might be able to help me. As a matter of fact, I've taken a good old royal hatred of the fellow."

Smith opened his eyes. "What on earth has he been doing? Have you had a row with him?"

"No," I said. "I can't explain it." "He struck me as an inoffensive sort of beggar. Always messing about with a box of colors. I thought him a bit moody, though, and put that down as the reason I never got to know him any better. Has he been giving you cheek or been crusty with you, or something?"

"Nothing like that," I replied. "It's simply that I don't trust him. I don't mind confiding in you, because I know it won't go any further; and, after all, up here you're out of the arena. But, confidentially, I think he's got some dirty work in hand. I don't know if you're interested. If so, I'll go on."

"Dirty work?" Smith put his elbows on the table. "I'm very interested, though I don't know what you mean by dirty work. But, if I can be of help you can count on me."

I looked round to make sure the door was shut. "By dirty work I mean this. Since I've come to Bracklenbridge I've had three damned narrow escapes from being finished off."

"What?" Smith's bright brown eyes were wide and unwinking in the steady candlelight. "How on earth— you mean, of course accidents? You don't mean—"

"I do. Two of them were deliberate attempts to lay me out. The first time it was a knife. The second it was by rifle bullets. The third time happened last night, but that possibly was not premeditated though perhaps the narrowest squeak of the lot."

Smith's forehead puckered in horror and surprise. Then he shook his head. "My dear chap, you can't be serious. That sort of things isn't done nowadays. Is there a catch in it some where— if so, let's have the joke."

"It's a pretty grim joke," I said abruptly.

"You mean it's true?" demanded Smith incredulously. "Why man, the thing's monstrous! Where's the object? What's the point of it?"

"That's what I would like to know," Smith pulled slowly at his cigar. "Tell me about it," he said. "How exactly did these things happen?"

I related baldly and briefly the circumstances of that evening in the cottage as well as my fishing expedition up the burn. "And last night," I concluded, "I was in the library of the Hall when I was shot at in the dark. The weapon, I think, was an air pistol."

"You stagger me!" Smith put down his cigar and ran his fingers through his hair nervously. "Of course, you've told the police?"

I shook my head. "That's not the way to lay 'em by the heels."

"You're probably right. Yes; I think the police would do no good, except make a bundle of it. But tell me— you said something about Seymore... Do you mean you connect Seymore in any way with these extraordinary attacks?"

"No. I don't go that length. All I say is there's something queer about the man." I paused and wondered whether I should relate the whole of the events since I had come to Bracklenbridge—my uncle's will our seeing Seymore that night in the library, and so on. While I hesitated, Smith cut in with:

"You mean you can't see any connection, but you feel there is one all the same?"

"Exactly. Though I must say it's all mighty obscure."

Smith refilled our tiny glasses with cognac and sipped his thoughtfully. "I can't see Seymore in the picture somehow," he said at length. "In the first place, he could have no earthly motive in wishing you ill. Besides, I don't honestly believe he has it in him!"

"I'm not so certain about that."

"Well, I can see him pottering about with a paintbox and spinning yarns about Shanghai, but I can't see him running knives into people."

"Possibly not. I don't say I'm laying too much stress on the Seymore idea."

"Do you know," said Smith, lying back and tilting his chair, "I do believe it's some half-baked lunatic who's got a grudge against you. It's the only reasonable explanation I can think of. Some village idiot from the district who's got an anarchistic germ in his blood. A sort of 'Down with all land-lords' obsession. You, being the laird here, are the handiest landlord for him to go for."

"Well, it's mighty uncomfortable. But I'll get him yet, though I wait a year."

"What worries me about that," declared Smith. "Is that he might get you first?"

"UNTIL THE END"
"Well, jolly good luck to him!"

"It's you who needs the luck," said Smith grimly. "If I were you, Drysdale, I'd clear out and let the lunatic blow off his steam on some one else. I know if I had that sort of thing hanging over me, I'd be in a mortal funk day and night."

"To be frank," I blurted out boldly. "I am. But that doesn't make any difference. I'm not clearing out till there's a bit of clearing up done first."

Smith nodded slowly, and twisted his liquor glass in his long fingers. "You mean you're really going to stick it?" he said at length. "No persuasion from a pal—"

Tells Dyspeptics

What To Eat
Avoid Gas-Indigestion

Strict diets are often unnecessary in stomach trouble. While some foods do produce excessive acidity and many stomachs do generate "too much acid" causing gas, sourness, bloating and after-eating pains, the trouble may be safely and quickly corrected by the use of a good alkaline. Bismarated Magnesia—powder or tablets—is ideal for this purpose. Just a little after meals neutralizes all the excess acid, prevents souring, breaks up gas and ends indigestion. Favorite foods no longer upset stomach and digestion is easy and painless. It will do all this for you or money back. Reliable Druggists everywhere sell Bismarated Magnesia with this guarantee.
