The Second Mrs. Draper

By Neal Pierce

CHAPTER XI

How could he make it clear to Dorian, Jim wondered as he paced the dark garden, that in refusing him she had actually thrown down the gauntlet, salute to Kitty's power over all their destinies. How could he win Dorian and go away by the same door? He looked with fighting eyes at the light in Kitty's windows. He wished that Kitty Draper would come down from her safe scented security up there. Would she face him in the open, in the wide free darkness, with Dorian and all defenses down. Then he could speak to her as a man to a woman. Not as a stepson to his father's wife. Suddenly the light in her window came down to him. He did not know how long he waited. No footsteps. Nothing. Until the sound of a haunting French street song carried on the wind. It came nearer. Jim thought oddly that she must be very happy to make so lovely a sound as that. She was there, and all defenses stopped. There was just the white blur of Kitty's face and the dark hair and the black gown was part of the night. She said, "Hello, I'd like a cigarette."

Jim bowed, gave her one, cupped the match. Her finger brushed the wax upon the tip. The match flared and he and she moved. Kitty said again with the same reckless politeness: "We heard your car. Then you didn't come in. Your father's asleep now. I couldn't. So I came down."

Then as the way his eyes were looking, she said quickly, "Shall we walk a bit?" With level courtesy Jim fell in at her side. Up and down the long walks past the bedded fragrant stock back and forth through the gates by the boxwood trees. No word was said, as if each waited for a midnight gun.

"It's like a mistral at Antioch," Kitty spoke at last.

Jim didn't say anything. He had been in Antioch when she had. With Gregory and Kitty, feeling the strain of his love. She looked at him as if to say, "Don't be insolent. I belong here too."

She stopped abruptly by the old lily pond. He looked up at the willow tree under which his mother had met her. "Black and Dorian raced their power boats. I imagine you used to play by this pond when you were a little boy." Kitty said, looking wide over the dim white fragile petals. "I like them best under moonlight. So beautiful."

Next second he couldn't believe that he had heard Kitty say, "How you are hating me here today. The words echoed and fell away. They turned to each other the faces of strangers met in battle. And he felt with a curious groping hope that she too suffered — if only for peace.

"I can play a game of happiness for your father's sake. You force me to this. But I cannot and will not let it win."

"Yes," Jim breathed. "Let's have no sickening lies of politeness. Only the solid honest truth. Sometimes strangers can do that, who hate each other."

"I don't hate you Jim."

His answer was the sharp hiss of his cigarette flung in the water. Kitty sensed that he had been bitterly angry, but she said pleasantly, "Somewhere—no only by her own presence, and that he had gone to cover. Deliberately she was sticking to the solid honest truth. Sometimes strangers can do that, who hate each other."

The Prince Edward Island Hospital, built, operated and maintained by this community, is an institution essential to our people . . . Continuous progress has been made since its organization over sixty years ago . . . All the progress made was possible only through the splendid contributions of its many friends and supporters . . . Those of the past did magnificently . . . Those of the present can be counted on to do their share equally as well. . . Three hundred thousand dollars is asked for now to provide the additional hospital accommodation needed to meet expanding civilian demands and also to provide fifty beds for disabled and suffering war veterans . . . Our wounded veterans should receive the very best possible hospital accommodation and care—and they should get it here on Prince Edward Island . . . The Prince Edward Island Hospital is doing its utmost to quickly meet the need . . . It should receive very generous support—very big subscriptions.

KISS YOUR TIRED FEELING GOODBYE!

Peeps Many Suffer Low Blood Count—And Don't Know It.

The baffling thing about low blood count is that you can weigh about as much as you ever did—even look healthy and strong; yet you can feel as if you had lead in your legs, dizzy, tired and peevish.

Low blood count means you haven't got enough red blood corpuscles. It's their vital job to carry life-giving oxygen from your lungs throughout your body. And just as it takes oxygen to explode gasoline in your car and make the power to turn the wheels, so you must have plenty of oxygen to explode the energy in your body and give you swing power.

Get Dr. Williams' Pink Pills today. They are world-famous for the help they give in increasing the number and strength of red corpuscles. Then with your blood count up, you'll feel like a new man.

abeth Hammond. It was in comment on the writings of Emily Murphy (Janey Canuck) . . . Yes, I think Janey Canuck helped me to see the loveliness of what lay near at hand instead of forever dreaming of beauty, just beyond the horizon. There I think is to be found the secret of contentment—being able to see and appreciate the beauty of ones surroundings and of course the charm of the folks with whom we daily come in contact. What delights are ours on The Island . . .

We went "kayflying" this evening James and I to the house across the lane. I had gone alone through the moonlight and James followed later, shyly opening the door. We chatted of many things, while Janey's mother knit two and purled one around a grey and a new gown, and Janey's shortcoming to fair folks, with garlands of daisies nodding a gay Summer pattern through the air.

We wondered about a sudden death that had occurred in the community where James had been, and I recalled that on one of my recent strolls from the corner store, this farmer was at the mill. I saw a young girl, a girl I had seen in the grist disappear through the crusher, when he and the younger miller had carried it there sack by sack. No sign then of the grim reaper, but I suspect even then there was a rustle of angel's wings if mortals' ears could only hear.

One whose journey, as a young man, took him to far places—over now except for the quiet procession that will wind one morning presently to his Church, then to be carried by reverent hands to his final resting place, in the adjoining cemetery, there to rest beside his people. And then James told us as well, how Janey's mother doorways said to him: "Before you go, have a look at the place I built in the bank for the kittens and see what you think of it." Which reminds me, now that the old clock is warning me to call this a day that an older multi-family real." Her laugh was a beautiful hard sound to hear. She got up quickly. Her hand gripped Jim's arm. He wheeled around. "Chin to chin, I'll give you into each other."

"Listen to me! You think I'm a hard cheap impostor, adventures with a Riviera reputation. You think I'll turn the House of Draper into a county club lounge. A gay whirl, flashy books, light flirtations, cocktails, cheap humor. You think I tricked your father into marriage. Don't you? Answer me!"

"That'll exhaust him, rob him, upset his life. You look forward to the day when I'll leave him. Don't you? Answer me!"

Kitty's eyes went over him with lightning scorn. He stood immovable, his eyes lighting back. "You stand there," she breathed "so righteously indignant. Like a pure young judge with no sin lurking at your elbow. Fix that. The Trial may be on. But the Defense rests!"

"I saw you once before." "When?" "Before you met my father. My senior year. I was in Europe that summer. In Nice."

"That's all right. That's always a lure for young seniors. Isn't it? And such a tawdry city too. Didn't you find it so?"

"I saw you there. I saw you dancing on the edge of a blue sea with a man who killed himself. He was your lover?"

She turned off her path, across the grass to the veranda terrace as if flying to Rupert, and Jim the ship at her heels.

"Godfrey Redding knew so many women. It was someone else, of course."

"No. It was you."

She stepped then under the veranda light. One pale arm was flung up across her eyes. He saw her lips move, heard the whisper. "My poor Godfrey!" For a minute she stood there, the greatest grief, and in her purity. Then he went stony with doubt.

"You think that I was ruthless—unmerciful. She's a little gasping laugh of sorrow. Then he saw for an instant her eyes full of profound pity, as if for himself. He bit his lips angrily. "Look at me!" Kitty breathed. "I look to you like a murderer!"

He said with great difficulty. "I cannot help it. You see, I saw him."

In the dead quiet Kitty said, "Ah, then remember this: I owe my whole life, my hope of everything on earth, to your own father now. And if you have no beauty or generosity in your heart for me, I cannot put it there. If you can not honor me, then honor him." Ahead of them they saw the door open and Rupert came out on the steps. He had on a house jacket, a highball in one hand, and he was smiling. Then he waved—and held up his glass.

"Come on. A slight libation to Bacchus before closing the bar." He put one cold hand on Jim's blindly. Jim moved toward her, felt the icy jeweled fingers clutch his own. Walking on a rocking world they mounted the steps to Rupert.

"We've been getting so acquainted," Jim said.

DOROTHY DIX

DEAR MISS DIX: I have been married now for eight months and my husband's attitude towards me puzzles me. He does not confide in me. I do not know anything about his financial affairs, or how much he makes. Whenever he goes to the bank to make a deposit or to cash a check his mother goes with him.

We both work and he insists on knowing every cent I make and what I do with it. Don't you think it queer that I am his mother to know all about her son's business while I know nothing?

L. W. K.

ANSWER: Evidently your husband has never out his mother's apron strings, and she is taking every precaution to keep him from ever doing it. Anyway, while she sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and if your husband keeps his money to himself, you will be wise to hang on to yours. But it is no way for a young couple to start out in marriage.
