Married Quarters

By DAVID LYALL

Continued

"I have never seen my sister-in-law's hospital," observed Lady Augusta cautiously; then quite suddenly put a leading question to Ruth.

You saw a good deal of Poppy when she was at home. Did she by any chance mention a man of the name of Bradford?"

Ruth coloured a little, and hesitated. Poppy had given her a complete confidence, but she did not know how far she would be justified in discussing the affair with Poppy's mother.

"I see that she did," said Lady Augusta in a voice of quite satisfaction. "Would it be too much to ask what she did say about him?"

Ruth, however, was not to be caught altogether unawares.

"Why do you ask granny? Has anything transpired about him?"

"He was here the other day."

"Here!" repeated Ruth in accents of supreme surprise. Lady Augusta inclined her head.

"I did not see him. He had the presumption to call upon the Rector and make a formal offer for Poppy's hand."

Ruth could not hide the intensity of her interest.

"And what happened?"

"The only thing that could happen The Rector very properly declined to discuss the question, I hope, Ruth, you did not encourage Poppy in this folly."

Ruth bit her lip, and her colour mounted higher.

"I did not, Lady Augusta. I knew too well what it would be likely to cost her; I implored her to try to forget him."

"Very sensible of you, I'm sure, and we are extremely obliged to you," said Lady Augusta, very much as she might have thanked some subordinate for service rendered. "I am glad that you realize now what can be due to a family heritage."

Ruth's grave lips curled a little.

"I'm afraid I didn't think so much about the heritage as the people. Lady Augusta: more especially about Captain Bradford."

"Why should you have reserved your special sympathy for him?" she asked rather indignantly, but almost immediately nodded as if some gleam of remembrance followed. "Of course, I understand that you—that you—"

"It is because I know so well what the Pomeroy heritage is, Lady Augusta, that I should be sorry for anyone outside voluntarily putting their heads under the yoke," she said with unexpected spirit.

"Dear me, yet I'm sure we have been kind to you; we have made unexampled efforts to make you happy."

"The effort has been perhaps too obvious," said the amazing creature quietly. "But we are talking about Poppy, Lady Augusta, not about me. I did everything I could think of to dissuade her. I painted her future in the most lurid colours I could find."

"Have you by any chances seen the man? Did he call here?"

"No, he did not call here, and I have never seen him. I question whether he even knows of my existence. It would be the last thing Poppy would ask him to do because she knew how thoroughly I disapproved of the whole affair."

Something in her daughter-in-law's tone annoyed Lady Augusta.

It was rebellious, suggestive of a thousand hidden fires which might any moment leap into flame. And she had imagined her counsel and reproof had been more effectual than that!

"Dear me, Ruth, you talk exactly as if Cudham were a den of lions, with martyrs walking about in it, ready to be devoured."

Ruth smiled faintly.

"It need not be that, but it is not a place for people born in another sphere, who cannot get rid of their personality. I do hope that Poppy will be prevented making this disastrous marriage for her own sake and the sake of the man. They could not possibly be happy."

"It is going to be prevented," said Lady Augusta grimly. "I am going to Farebridge next week after the Federation meetings at Lewes are over, and I will most certainly bring Poppy back."

"Meanwhile, what is the state of affairs, if I may ask?"

"The state of affairs is that her Aunt Victoria has written and given the Rector the gist of a letter in which according to her, Bradford accepted his dismissal in a quite amazingly proper spirit. But I don't trust the present environment for Poppy. The war has created all sorts of abnormal situations and even abnormal feelings. Poppy is very wilful and impressionable. I shall only be happy about her when I have her safely under my own wing."

"Will she stay? The very war conditions you have mentioned may prevent it."

"There is some parental authority left in a war-torn world, I hope. How are the children this morning, and may I see them?"

"They have gone to the Coppice with Nannie, and won't be back, I am afraid, much before one."

"Are you sure Nannie doesn't drop into cottages en route? I hope you are very particular about that. I never fail to warn her when I see her."

"I don't warn her, granny. They must take risks like other babies. I don't want them wrapped in cotton-wool all their lives."

When she saw from the expression of the elder woman's face the rebuke that was coming she held up a slightly deprecating hand.

"They will be twelve months old next week, granny, and I have made up my mind."

"About what, may I ask?"

"That I can't stop here any longer. They don't need me at the moment, not as they will need me in, say, two years. I am going back to the war. I have accepted a post as Superintendent in one of the Women's Auxiliary Camps, and have promised to start work in France in two weeks from now."
