NO MORE GOOD-BYES

By Margaret Mair

CHAPTER XXV

Several months later on a fine winter afternoon Susan pushed round the revolving doorway of the Criterion and as she entered the restaurant, came suddenly face to face with Gerard Barclay.

They shook hands. He was just the same; just as well-groomed, clean and imperturable. Impossible to tell what he was thinking or even if he was glad to see her again. He put his hand momentarily on her arm. "Come and have some tea with me. You're not meeting anybody, are you?"

"No," she said. "I'd love to have tea with you. Fancy seeing you again like this after all these months."

They were led up the long narrow tearoom and ushered to a table for two in a secluded corner at the far end. She sat down gratefully. She had been walking for a long way and she felt tired. Wednesday was her free day—the day when Mrs. Glover, the daily woman, came to the flat and she was able to leave Gillian and come to the West End to do shopping.

She felt that Gerard Barclay was looking at her. Studying her, she thought, taking her in seeing whether life was dealing kindly with her. She wondered herself sometimes whether she had changed much. She felt, at moments, years older. It was strange, to be a widow before you were thirty; it gave you a kind of outcast separated feeling, moving through life, but not part of it.

"You're looking very charming." She smiled at him gratefully.

"Oh, I'm all right now." She chose some sandwiches from the trolly which had been stopped at their table.

"Tell me about yourself," Gerard Barclay said. "We've lost touch with you for so long. What happened to you after you left Gib? I know my sister will be glad to have news of you."

"Well," she said, "I dont know that there's very much to tell. I came back to England and stayed with my father for a time. I wasn't very well. I suppose it was the shock—but I'm quite all right again now. Since then I've been in London, and I'm here with my little girl. My mother married again not long ago, you know, and she's let us have her small flat in Chelsea. It's very nice and comfortable, overlooking the Embankment. And there, I expect we shall stay."

His tone did not change. "You've told me nothing, of course, yet. Are you happy.'"

She hesitated. "I'm not unhappy."

"You're so young. You must be lonely."

"Yes," she said. I'm very lonely sometimes."

He drank his tea slowly. "Has it all been worth while?"

She glanced at him, "I'm glad I went back. It's the one thing I've been thankful for. There were mistakes before that but that wasn't one of them."

"You've been very loyal," he said. "You have no reason to reproach yourself."

His voice was just as she remembered it; dry, clipped, unemotional, "I wonder if you heard what happened after you left. Dering is divorcing his wife. Jewell's title and money proved too alluring in the end for our lovely Fenella. He's sent in his papers, poor sap; she's determined to have him. So that's that I wonder how long before he lives to regret it."

"I hadn't heard about that," Susan said. "What is to become of Leslie?"

"Oh, Dering's to have Leslie. Fenella never cared a rap about him, anyway. He's been sent to school in England."

"Well," said Susan, "what a bust-up all round. Poor Roy! And he never did any harm to anybody. What has happened to your sister? Are she and her husband still out there?"

"Their time's nearly up. They'll be home this spring."

He moved a little sideways in his chair so that his arm touched hers. "Will you let me come and see you?"

"Do," she said. 'I'll give you my address."

There was a moment's silence and he looked at her. Her own voice, she knew, had been deliberately unemotional. She felt that he was disappointed.

She smiled at him and their eyes met. "In future," she said, "I'm going to live very warily.'

"You're afraid of being hurt?"

She nodded. "Probably that's it. And I'm still all numb, anyway. I can't feel anything."

"Oh, yes."

"You will in time."

She leaned back in her chair. He put out his hand and covered hers. She moved restlessly. The situation held no attraction for her. He was not what she wanted. But how impossible to explain.

"Nobody like you need be lonely.'

She flushed. "I suppose not."

"You know I think you're very attractive—very desirable?"

She shook her head slightly.

"At any rate," he persisted, "you'll let me come and see you?"

"Yes, of course." She looked at her wrist-watch. "And now I must go. I've still a lot of shopping to do. And I've got to get home to my infant."

"Very well.' He paid the bill and collected his hat and stick. His fingers were on her arm as they moved out through the crowded tea-room.

Island Expectations Sadly Disappointed Says Premier Jones

In presenting the brief on Prince Edward Island claims for special consideration at the recent Dominion Provincial Conference, Premier Jones enlarged on the text which was supplied to the press. Following is the official stenographic report of his concluding remarks at the plenary session held on April 30:

"When the proposals of the Government of Canada were presented it was thought to be the exact embodiment of what is desider for it proposed to equalize services in the various provinces. Federal agents, newspapers, politicians, radio, reconstruction organizations and other publicity means aroused the people to an awareness of a great reconstructive time approaching. I am afraid I, myself, have been guilty of holding out great hopes in the fields of public investment, social services and even education.

Disappointing

"But I find that little or no provision is made for our economic need on Prince Edward Island, that we are paid per capital like other provinces, that nothing is provided beyond what will balance the budget and pay the pension.

"If the various small taxes were given back to the provinces it would still be inadequate. In fact two million is about one million away from a subsidy which would allow even a measure of what is envisaged in the proposals.

"There is a danger in accepting the new plan for three years and allowing federal standards of salaries, wages and so forth to invade the Province. It might be a more prudent policy to reject the whole plan unless a more liberal subsidy is provided and the plan be continued more than three years.

"However, I would be willing to lay the decision arrived at here before our government for their rejection or approval before committing ourselves.

Conclusion

"We believe that, when our position has been examined by the other provinces and by the Dominion, when they thoroughly understand and appreciate the extent to which our expenditures have been curtailed in the past to insure sound financing and when they are convinced of the Province's inability to cope with the ever-expanding services with limited revenues, there will not be any fear of discrimination.

"Whether or not the Dominion proposals are accepted, this Province urges the establishment of some form of Federal Council which in the future would control or advise upon all matters of financial relations. Such a council should comprise representatives of each of the provinces as well as of the Dominion.

"The tables herewith presented are included so that the intention of the government's expenditures in the next three years can be declared to each province. Items considered necessary in other provinces are not included here. Mothers allowances, university grants, costly construction, extensive road building is not planned. Even the low level of expenditure proposed will require fifty per cent more as a subsidy than has been suggested so far by the government of Canada.

Per Capita Grants

"I might have remarked that "per capita" grants are very difficult to apply. If a province increases in population the grants increase. If the population decreases the converse will hold true more or less. Thus provinces might go into a declining spiral over a loss of population.

"Corporations tend to locate in the central provinces. The control of custom and excise duties encouraged central location. They develop large centres of population. They are finally taxed heavily, but the taxes are passed by them to the ultimate consumer. After these taxes are distributed as subsidies to the provinces and elsewhere there still remains located in the central provinces the large population centres, the huge bargaining power, the political influence, the municipal comforts. They can provide for themselves such as electricity, medical services, entertainment, splendid housing, social life and many other benefits which amount to far more than the tax passed out to less-favoured localities—such as some of the provinces. The Central Provinces cannot afford to be selfish to their corporation's customers.

"To summarize our position, I might quote to you, for instance, the average earnings of males, their wage earning in Canada: The average in Prince Edward Island, in 1941, was $596, and the average in Canada was $988. The proportion of Prince Eward Island wage earnings to all of Canada was that of 1 to 10-64/100ths; and as against 1 to 5-44/100ths for all of Canada; in other words, Prince Edward Island had the lowest average wage earnings, about 60 per cent of the average of Canada, yet each wage earner in Prince Edward Island supported twice as many dependents as did the average wage earner in Canada.

Quotes Year Book

"The 1945 business Year Book showed the percentage of the total earnings of the province to be 26/100ths of the total earnings of Canada, and the population was 8/10ths.% In other words, with a population of 8/10ths of Canada we earned only 1-3rd, I think, of what we should have earned.

"Take it another way. Take the total provincial and municipal revenues of the province: this is the 1943 figure of the Dominion Study of Finances. The total provincial revenue of all provinces amounted to $591,000,000 on a per capita basis; the province should have had $4,728,000, but all we collected was $1,562,000.

"Now, if you want further proof of that, take the ninth victory loan. When the National Finance Committee made an assessment of $1,330,000,000, they made an allotment for Prince Edward Island of $3,300,000. If they had allotted it, recognizing their earnings as much as the rest of Canada they would have allotted us $10,644,000. So, even up here in Ottawa, when they get down to facts, they recognize that we have only about one-third as much money as the rest of Canada."
