Broken Wings

CONTINUED THE GODS MUST BE AVENGED

The second conclave to discuss the punishment of the white man was held in the settlement proper. The image of Paloola was carried out into the center of the clearing. A platform with Aruman's much moved bamboo throne was set before it. All the beads and feathers the tribe possessed were in evidence for the occasion. And Aruman was painted from head to foot with the bright red and blue of the ink used in tattooing.

The chief was in a precarious position. He knew far better than his people the seriousness of what they meant to do. But it was long since he had seen any white men. He was no longer young, he could not match his strength against the age old law of the tribe, backed up by the superstition of his people. It was best, he believed, for both white people to die if one had to be sacrificed. He meant, it was true, to make one last attempt to save their lives, but he had little hope that it would succeed.

The drum sounded its long roll. Solemnly the tribe assembled, men on one side, women and children on the other. In the clear space before Aruman, Ahlways stood, his hands only lightly tied. When the chief had seated himself, Bill was led out and placed directly in front of the platform. Lastly Katherine appeared. She was not bound and took her place near Bill accompanied only by the curious stares of the natives.

Aruman rose. "We are come, my fathers and my brothers, to make a last talk over the white man and his woman. You know the sin. You know the punishment. About it have talked with each other about it in the long watches of the night. Speak now, and speak wisely, for the gods listen and weigh what you say."

All eyes turned toward the old man who was Aruman's chief adviser. Slowly he got to his feet, for he was heavy with sleeplessness. All during the night he had talked with the tribesmen, weighing their arguments, seeking for the best solution. He knew Aruman's secret wish that a way be found to spare the white people.

ple. He knew, too, that the people were greedy for the spectacle of such a sacrifice to the gods as the death of the white man would be. And he believed simply in the teaching of the tribal laws.

All these things were in his mind when he began "Many words are not good when great trouble comes. Few words and wise I ask Paloola to put in my mouth. It is good that the white man and the white woman die together. Let them die. Let us forget them. Let the tongue be cut from the mouth of any man who speaks their names when they have died. They have brought us trouble enough. Already the rains are late. When the sun rises tomorrow may it rise on their last hour. Let the white woman die in the place of our brother Ahlways. May her white spirit lead the dark spirit of the evil white man from us. I have spoken."

"You have heard," Aruman proclaimed to his people. Ahlways raised his bound hands. "Let me speak," he cried. "That is my brother, that white man who stands there. We are sealed to each other by the mingling of our blood. He is my brother and I am his, even as sons of the same mother. Let him tell me that he frees me from death. From his hand only will I accept life."

There was a low wall from Ummata. Aruman turned to Bill. "Your blood brother says only from you will he except the gift of life. It is for you to say whether he or the white woman will die with you."

Bill turned a despairing face from the chief to Katherine. He looked into the eyes of Ahlways, who forced this choice upon him. He tried to speak. No. He could not say the words that would condemn Katherine to death. He dropped his head upon his breast and hid his eyes from the sight of the girl who stood so quietly near him.

But Ahlways stubbornly shook his head. "No. Let the white man speak. Who am I to take like twice from a woman? My mother gave me birth. It is not good for another woman to give me life. Let my brother speak."

There was silence in the camp. Bill remained with his head upon his breast. Katherine took his hand in hers. "Speak. Tell them we wish to die together."

Ahlways shook the rope from his hands, folded his arms across his breast and stepped to Bill's other side. There they stood, those three, a brown man, a white man and a white woman, their forms brightly outlined in the tropical sun.

Aruman waited until the silence became oppressive. Then he stood up and said, "Let us leave this in the hands of our gods. Let us go to the mountain. If the rains come before morning we will spare their lives. If the rains fall, then they will die. I, Aruman, decree that the white woman shall die with the white man. Are you satisfied, my people?" "Let the white man speak," Ahlways said stubbornly. Aruman addressed Bill. "Speak, white man. Is it your wish that the white woman die in the place of your blood brother, Ahlways?" Bill raised his head. Katherine's hand pressed his firmly. Ahlways looked expectantly, and Bill knew that whatever he answered Ahlways would accept his judgment uncomplainingly. Pity and understanding smote him. His voice was steady when he answered, "It is my wish that if I die the white woman die with me."

Aruman translated his words. A long sigh swept through the camp. Ummata burst into a chant of rejoicing that her lover was saved. A guard struck off the slight rope that still hung on Ahlways's legs. He was free again.

"Let us go to the mountain," Aruman cried. "Let us watch for the coming rain."

It was a strange possession that presently wended its way through the forest. Ummata and the other women chanted joyfully for the saving of Ahlways's life. Bill walked between his guards conscious of nothing save a wild hope that rain would fall. Katherine, walking with the other women gave little thought to the chance of rain. All her heart was with the tall sun-burned man she had come to love so well that death was preferable to life without him.

When they arrived at the mountain clearing Bill was bound again to a tree. Katherine was permitted her freedom, but stayed with the other women, although always in sight of Bill's still figure. Two more sentinels were sent to the top of the hill. A huge fire was kindled and Aruman constructed some kind of ceremony for hastening the rain clouds.

Since the decision of the morning a strong current of sympathy had made itself felt for the white man. Katherine's deed had kindled admiration in the hearts of this primitive people who knew and recognized bravery when they saw it. Except for one or two malcontents who, even as in civilized countries, loved trouble for its own sake and preached pessimism as a rule every one hoped that the rain clouds would appear.

But noon came and still the sky was clear. Aruman redoubled his devotions. The sentinels paced slowly round the hill, looking far and wide for any sign of clouds. Men and women flocked down to the seashore to stare out over the salt water and went back to the camp to listen to the gloomy prophecies of those who said the clouds would never come until the gods were appeased by the death of the white man.

Then, in the late afternoon, a shout arose. Bill lifted his head. The sentinels on the hill were dancing wildly up and down. Far off, in the west no bigger than a man's hand, appeared a cloud. Others followed it. Soon the heavens were dark and a chant of thankfulness arose. Ahlways's face beamed with joy. Katherine felt some of the contagion and held her head in thankfulness for their delivery. But the joy did not last long.

Due to some caprice of the wind the clouds drew near, then veered suddenly and were driven rapidly back across the sky and disappeared below the horizon and the sun shone brightly once more. The camp was full of whispers. Plainly the clouds had come, had seen the white man, and had gone away again. The god of the mountain had spoken. Hope was gone for Katherine and Bill. Nothing could stop their execution in the morning when the sun arose.

It was only when this was apparent from the talk of the elders and from Aruman's discouraged face that a watcher might have seen Ahlways pass by the women's quarters and drop a few words spoken so quietly that none noticed the girl's startled glance. But a little later she found Ahlways's eyes intent upon her, and raising her hand to shade her eyes she managed at the same time, unperceived, to nod her head in assent to his command.
