DOCHERTY-CURRIE NUPTIALS—A very pretty wedding took place at the home of Mrs. Ruby Currie, Green Bay, on Sept. 16th, when her daughter, Velma Jean, was united in marriage to Mr. Earl Alexander Docherty, son of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Docherty of Kingston. The bride, who was charmingly attired in a dress of blue crepe, was attended by her sister, Christine, who was dressed in wine. The groom was ably supported by Mr. William Hounam, Elmwood. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Woodside of Cornwall in the presence of the immediate relatives only. A delicious wedding supper was then served by the bride's mother, assisted by Mrs. Daniel Docherty. Immediately afterwards the young couple were charivaried by a large assemblage of friends and neighbors, who then retired to their homes, wishing them many years of happy wedded life.

STONE - DOCHERTY—A pretty wedding took place at the parsonage, Cornwall, on Wednesday afternoon, September 20th at 2 o'clock when Ruth Evelyn, youngest daughter of Mr. Ernest Stone and the late Mrs. Stone became the bride of Mr. John William Docherty, oldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Docherty, Kingston. The ceremony was performed by Rev. E. R. Woodside, B.A., Cornwall. The bride looked charming in a Royal Blue transparent velvet dress and hat with matching accessories. She carried a beautiful bouquet of pink and white gladiolis. Miss Bessie Stone, sister of the bride, attended as bridesmaid and wore light green taffeta with picture hat to correspond. The groom was attended by Mr John Matheson. Following the ceremony a reception was held at the home of the bride to the immediate relatives. Prior to her marriage the bride was tendered a shower at her home where she received many lovely and useful gifts, including a beautiful set of dishes. The happy young couple will reside in Kingston, where the groom is a prosperous young farmer. The Guardian joins in extending congratulations.

ISLAND LADY DEAD—Mr. and Mrs. John MacEwen of Kensington received the sad news on Monday last of the death of their eldest daughter, Ella, in a hospital in Edmonton, Alta. Miss MacEwen had lived in the West for a number of years and held a responsible position with the Soldier's Settlement Board in Saskatoon, Sask, under the Saskatchewan Government. She had not been in gool health for some time and on the advice of a specialist had gone to Edmonton for an operation which was performed on Sept. 19th. For a few deys she seemed to rally but later her illness took a serious turn and she passed away on Sept. 27. The funeral was held from a funeral home on Sept. 30 and burial was in Edmonton. Many beautiful floral tributes were sent by sympathetic friends. In July 1938 she with her sister, Mrs. J. A. MacAdam and her niece, Mary B. MacAdam of Edam, Sask. motored to their home here and spent a pleasant holiday revisiting old friends who will hear of her death with sorrow and a deep sense of personal loss. Besides her parents one brother, Bertram L. MacEwen of New London and one sister, Mrs. MacAdam of Edam, Sask. are left to mourn. To all the sorrowing ones the sympathy of a large circle of relatives and friends is extended

MR. SMITH AND THE COMFORT INN

Once upon a time there was a man called Joseph Hercules Smith, but he always signed himself Joseph H., and hoped people would think the H. stood for Henry.

Mr. Smith was a very kind man. He threw out crumbs for the sparrows in winter, and gave pennies to beggars, and he was so fond of children that he used to stop and pat them on the head and ask them how old they were. He kept a public house, a very pleasant-looking public-house; it was called "The Comfort Inn."

One day a traveller came to the inn and asked for a cup of tea.

"Tea !" exclaimed Mr. Smith. "Come, now, let me draw you a glass of beer; nothing like beer to give you Comfort Inn-side, you know!"

"I never found beer a comfort, myself," said the traveller.

"Well, well, there's no accounting for tastes," said Mr. Smith, and brought the tea. "You're a stranger to these parts, I take it?"

"That's right," said the traveller. "I've a special line in spectacles that I'm trying to get people to use."

"Find it a paying business?" asked Mr. Smith.

"Not yet, but it will be a paying business for everybody in the end," said the traveller. "The fact is I'm so anxious to get people to see things straight that I'm giving the spectacles away!"

"You don't say!!" exclaimed Mr. Smith.

"Yes, I do" said the traveller. "If people could only be got to see things as they really are, and not as they think they see them, there'd be a lot less trouble in the world, especially for the children."

"There you get me on a tender spot," said Mr. Smith. "When you talk about the children you can do anything with me; I wouldn't hurt one for a fortune."

"Humph!" said the traveller. "I saw some children playing in the gutter at the end of the street — curly hair, and bad shoes."

"Blue eyes?" asked Mr. Smith.

"That's right," said the traveller; "I noticed the eyes because they were the only part clean enough to show the colour. Know them?"

"Know them!" echoed Mr. Smith. "Of course I do, bless their little hearts! Name of Thompson. Mother's a regular customer here, very regular."

"There were some other children playing a little lower down the street," went on the traveller, "four of them; they looked as though they didn't know what it was to have a square meal."

"No more they do, poor little things," agreed Mr. Smith; "I know the ones you mean. Father's a day-labourer — Dickson, Bill Dickson—comes every night for his bit of Comfort Inn here—excuse my joke! Very poor wages, day-labouring, and with food so dear it's no wonder the children have to go hungry. Many's a tail end of a joint of mutton, or the left-over half of a rabbit-pie my wife's sent 'em—she's as soft-hearted as myself where children come in."

"Humph!" said the traveller for the second time. "I'm thinking I'd better leave you a pair of spectacles!"

So the traveller left the spectacles on the bar, paid for his tea, and went out.

Mr. Smith rubbed the spectacles on his handkerchief and put them on. Everything looked just as it always did—bright fire, gleaming brasses, everything clean and neat. "They don't seem to make much difference," he said and strolled out into the porch to see if the street, too, would look as it usually did.

Just at that moment twelve o'clock began to strike from the Market Hall, and Mrs. Thompson came out of her house higher up the street.

"Albert Egbert, come out of the gutter there, you naughty boy," she cried angrily. "No one would ever think I'd given you a bath only last Saturday as ever was! Maud Annie, you take them all in the house this very minute!" And she slapped the nearest child and picked up the baby and thumped it on the doorstep.

"It's a deal too soft with them, I am," she said, as she came towards the inn. "There's not many mothers would make the sacrifices I do for the ungrateful brats.

Mr. Smith felt himself getting quite red with indignation. "I'm thinking the sacrifices are on the other leg, as one might say, Mrs. Thompson."

"Why, what do you mean?" cried Mrs. Thompson.

"Mean!" said Mr. Smith. "I mean it's the children that have made the sacrifices, not you. Look at their rags! Look at the dirt on them! If you hadn't fuddled your brains into a rice-pudding with beer, you'd never have let the poor little things get into that state!"

Mrs. Thompson stood and stared. "Of all the impudence!" she gasped. "You can keep your old Comfort Inn, I'll never come near it again!" And away she flounced.

Mr. Smith took off the spectacles to mop his face. "Now what made me talk to her like that?" he asked himself. "It's bad for business —and yet I don't know what else I could have said, and me so fond of children."

Just at that minute there came a tug at his coat. It was little Violet Amanda Dickson, with an empty pie-dish in her hand.

"Well, my dear?" said Mr. Smith and patted her kindly on the head.

"Please, sir, mother's sent the dish back, and please, she said to thank you kindly, because there wasn't any money left to get anything else to eat, and please, me and Bobby and Sarah and Joe liked it very much, only there wasn't enough of it."

"Well, well!" said Mr. Smith, patted her on the head again. "We'll have to take care there's more left for you next time, eh? See, here's a penny — you know where the sweeties are sold."

Violet Amanda ran off down the street, and Mr. Smith was left with the pie-dish in one hand and the spectacles in the other. That meant he had no hand to do anything else, which was awkward, so he put the spectacles back on his nose.

No sooner were they in place than he nearly dropped the pie-dish. "Good gracious!" he exclaimed. "What was it the child said about there being no money left to buy anything else to eat? Why, Bill Dickson spends money here every night, and when I've got his money I've the impudence to give the children pennies and send his wife scraps of food I don't want to eat myself, and think I'm being generous! Not another glass does Bill buy here while those children go short," exclaimed Mr. Smith, "but it will be bad for business—very bad for business," he added, ruefully. "It must be these spectacles that make me see things so differently!"

And just then he looked up at the inn sign over the porch—he looked a second time; no, there was no doubt about it, the sign said plainly, "The Discomfort Inn."

"Well, well!" sighed Mr. Smith. "After all the other things those spectacles have made me see, I don't wonder even the signs looks different. The Discomfort Inn; yes, that's the right name for it when you see things straight; it's discomfort people buy here for themselves and the children, and it's only discomfort I'd get out of it for myself now, if I went on selling beer. I'll have to turn it into an ordinary shop and sell greengroceries and bread—and sweets, because I am so fond of the children. There may not be much money in the business, compared to selling beer, but I'll know that I'm doing what I can to be a Comfort Inn the neighbourhood," he added, with his jolly laugh, "and that will give me Comfort Inn—inside, you know!" said he.

What Does it Matter, by Margaret Baker.

WHAT ALCOHOL DOES

Study II. October 8th, 1939

(Intermediate Senior)

By EDITH LANG

In the last lesson, we found that alcohol is made by the spoiling of good food, and that Canadians are spending more than three million dollars per week on alcoholic beverages. What are the effects, on individuals and on society, of the use of such drinks?

To begin with, alcohol is a definite chemical substance (its formula is C_2H_5OH), and like all chemical substances, it will always act in the same way in a given set of circumstances.

For thousands of years the harmful effects of alcoholic beverages when taken in large quantities have been known. It is only in comparatively recent years that accurate scientific instruments and methods have been used by scientists all over the world to test the effects on the human body, mind and spirit of the so-called "moderate use of alcohol," that is to say, of its use in quantities less than those necessary to produce "drunkenness."

During the War, the British Government, realizing that the use of alcohol was reducing the efficiency of its citizens, appointed a commission of scientific men (only one of them represented the Temperance forces) to study how and why alcohol decreases efficiency, and their published results are full of interesting material, based entirely on scientific facts.

Here are some of their findings:

1. Alcohol is a poisonous narcotic drug which, like chloroform and ether and other anaesthetics, slows up all our functions and finally causes unconsciousness.

2. However little alcohol is taken, that little goes straight and unchanged into the blood stream and quickly circulates through every part of the body.

3. Its chief effect, when taken in small quantities, is on what is called the "central nervous system," which consists of the brain and the spinal cord. If you touch a hot iron by mistake, you immediately draw away your hand. What has really happened is that the nerves in your hand "stimulated" by the heat, have sent a message by one (sensory) nerve to one part of your brain which registers the unpleasant sensation. From here a further message goes to another part of your brain which by means of another nerve sends a message back to the muscles of your arm telling them to contract and so your hand is pulled away from the heat. It is this sort of telephone system and exchange which is called the nervous system, that is narcotized, or doped, and so retarded, by the use of alcohol, even in very small quantities.

You know that when a baby is born, it can breathe, swallow and digest. That is because the part of a baby's brain which tells it how to do those things is already developed when it is born. But the baby cannot walk or talk or otherwise make coordinated movements because that part of its brain is not yet functioning. But later the baby makes movements, and by continual use and practice, the "muscular control" part of its brain works accurately. Later on still, the child learns to read and write; the "mental control" part of its brain has become active. But still the child cannot be expected to have as much sense as a grown-up person. We say, "You cannot expect an old head on young shoulders." It is only later still that the final part of our brain develops, as we gradually practice making judgments, using self-control, criticising ourselves, and being cautious: in fact it is only that part of our brain which makes us different from animals. There is not, of course, any definite stage of a child's life at which any of these powers develop. They overlap more or less, but the power of our nerves to perform their functions do normally develop gradually from birth to manhood in this order.

This scientific report tells us that when alcohol reaches the brain, it attacks these various groups of nerves, and, sad to relate, it attacks the last grown (and the most important) group first. That is to say, alcohol dopes or paralyses these "nerve centres" in the opposite order to that in which they have developed. What happens is this. At the first small dose of alcohol, the power of self-criticism is deadened, the person becomes self-satisfied, he loses his sound judgment and his sense of values. Caution vanishes. But the other parts of his brain governing his mental, physical and emotional functions are still "too strong" to be doped by this small quantity of alcohol and so he says and does things which he would not have done if his judgment had not been dulled; he becomes talkative, laughs a lot at feeble jokes, gets angry without much cause. If a still stronger dose of alcohol is taken, the mental controls are paralysed. If more still is taken the motor control fail, and the man cannot walk or talk straight. Finally the paralysis of the brain goes so far that he falls into a heavy sleep, or even, in extreme earliest function of breathing is completely paralysed, the man will die. Step by step, the paralysing effect of alcohol overtakes the different nerve centres of the brain in the reverse order in which those centres were developed, but it is to be noted that as Sir Lauder Brunton, King Edward VII's physician, said, "Alcohol paralyses the brain, and the paralysis begins with the first glass."

4. Further, the Commission's report states that drunkenness, as we know it, namely the inability to talk and walk straight, is not the only effect of alcohol. Drunkenness is the symptom or sign that the person has now taken sufficient alcohol into his system to dope even the strong nerve centres which control his muscular movements. But long before that, "without signs of intoxication in the full ordinary or in the legal sense of the term, the drinker's bearing and individual attitude of mind temporarily change as the result of the drug. And those in contact with the person so affected have, for the time being, to deal with an altered individual, whose mind lacks its normal factor of judgment and conspicuous elements of its self-control."

5. the fifth finding of the Commission was that "what a man thinks or feels about his performance with the use of alcohol is no true index of what he has really accomplished." In all the experiments which were carried out to test the relative efficiency of people working with and without alcohol, those people who had had the alcohol were always self confident, always certain that they had put up a better record than usual, and were only convinced of their lowered efficiency when confronted with the recording machines. In the words of the report, "Self-satisfaction is increased by the use of alcohol, but neither skill nor power is. From the very beginning of taking alcohol there was some impairment of skill, and there was also an increased feeling of satisfaction." We can see why this was so. For even before a dose of alcohol large enough to spoil the efficient control of the muscles had been taken, quite sufficient had been drunk to deaden the man's power of judgment and his self-criticism and so he was unable to recognize his own inefficiency later on.

Hence we see that the consequences of taking even such small quantities of liquor as are contained in one bottle of beer or one cocktail are harmful and are due to the rapid passing of the alcohol to the brain and its power of doping all parts of the brain in the reverse order to that in which they were developed. "The direct effect of alcohol upon the nervous system, in all stages and upon all parts of the system, is to depress or suspend its functions; that it is, in short, from first to last a narcotic drug."

NEXT SUNDAY TO BE SPECIAL DAY OF PRAYER

SYDNEY, Oct. 4—Next Sunday will be set apart as a special "day of prayer" in all churches throughout the Dominion of Canada, according to an announcement made at last night's opening meeting of the Maritime Synod of the Presbyterian Church by Rev. C. S. Parker, Toronto, Moderator of the General Assembly.

The Federal Government is issuing a proclamation to this effect and the occasion will be observed by all denominations.

Rev. Mr. Parker urged the ministers of the Presbyterian Church in the Maritimes domain to fully observe the event which has been prescribed on account of existing war situation.

Girl Guide News

The following are extracts from a letter from Mrs. Warren, Chief Commissioner to Mrs. Reay in reply to many inquiries which are coming to Dominion Headquarters in regard to Guide service on the home front.

"The Executive Committee at its September meeting agreed that Guiding shall carry on as usual — only more so. More than ever before, Guiding is needed not only as a wholesome recreational activity for thousands of girls, but one in which they will learn to be prepared for emergencies through their Guide training in first aid, home nursing and physical fitness which are all a part of the fourfold programme of Guiding.

"For these reasons all leaders of the Girl Guides Association should bear in mind the importance of keeping on with their Guide work as a service which can be of real value to the children who are today needing not only its practical training of preparedness for emergencies, but its recreational pursuits which will help maintain steadiness and morale in this crisis in which the Empire finds itself. We Guides have the opportunity to show how much Guiding has to give along these lines.

Mrs. Warren also quotes a letter from H. R. H Princess Alice, Commissioner for overseas for Imperial Headquarters as follows:

I should like to send the following message to your Guides and Guiders who are, I am sure, at one with us in their desire to serve the Empire.

The chance to help in the fight for freedom and justice has come first to the Guides in Great Britain because they are nearest to the scene of action, and they have been splendidly helpful and reliable.

As Commissioner for Overseas, I know all you Guides in whatever part of the great Commonwealth of Nations you may be living are just as anxious to play your part, and I am certain will find plenty of ways in which you can do so, but don't desert your Guiding for war work unless your help is especially needed. Remember the young will need your care ever so much more now when probably both their parents may be engaged in war work of some sort. It is no use fighting against Hitlerism if we allow the new generation to grow up without religion, good principles or discipline. These ideals are the very foundation of our Guide Movement, and it is on such a foundation alone that we can hope to build a new and happier world —a world in which peace and good-will shall prevail against the forces of cruelty and injustice.

KHAKI FOR DINNERS

LONDON, —(CP)— Khaki is the popular color for dinner dresses, according to London stylists. Since blackouts do not prevent dining out, there is a heavy demand for dinner gowns.
