DANGEROUS INNOCENCE

By HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR (Copyright by Public Ledger) (Continued)

CHAPTER XIII Paris Paris! Sally would never forget her first view of it, and yet her first few days were tinged with the memory of her good by to Allen Leigh. At Cherbourg a tender had come out from shore for them. Allen had told her he would stand on the top deck and wave good-by to her, and she had waved until they had rounded the point and the ship was no longer visible. It reminded her vaguely of the day she had waved to Tom, and this fact gave her a twinge of conscience. Yet she felt somehow that Allen understood. She hadn't tried to make him love her; she hadn't flirted with him, not as Myra had with Mr. Britton. Mr. Britton was with them on the train going to Paris. He seemed very possessive with Myra, and Sally, who hadn't liked him from something to drink. Sally was the first, was troubled. She tried facts could materially change her. She was herself, and Myra was Myra. Paris was marvelous. It had so many moods. Sometimes it was brilliant, sometimes tender, sometimes provocative, but always interesting. They stayed at a little hotel right near the center of things. Sally would have adored it all if it hadn't been for Mr. Britton. She was content with just Myra. They would wake up in the morning and have coffee and little crusty rolls brought to their room. Then they would walk to the shops. Myra treated her to three new dresses, much more sophisticated dresses than she would have dared to buy for herself. And she had reached a point where it was rather pleasant to visualize herself as she would appear on the boat bound for Rio. This time she would have had the experience of crossing the Atlantic, which would, of course, give her confidence. It wouldn't be like crossing the ocean for the first time. She was now accustomed to a boat and its ways. Perhaps she might even cope with Myra's popularity. The thought gave her a thrill of anticipation. There were times when Myra was utterly adorable, but in the evening when Mr. Britton took them to dinner at some wild place in Montmartre she changed utterly. Of course, they always had something to drink. Sally was learning to sip wine in an inconse-

to think, however, of what Myra had said. She took things too seriously. Why not just enjoy her self and forget about everything else? It wasn't as if she could take a trip like this every day. And so she tried not to notice when Mr. Britton caught Myra's hand as they were going to lunch. It was provincial to think of such things in these enlightened days. Myra said so, and, besides, it was Myra's affair and not her own. But why did she like him, and why did she encourage him? He seemed so dissipated to Sally. Yet when she had said so to Myra the latter had laughed. "What of it? I'm not thinking of marrying him, you know." In Paris, Sally almost forgot everything save the fact that she was actually there. She began to feel that she was actually taking things less seriously. She began to hope that she might attain some of Myra's sophisticated poses and worldliness. After all, it wasn't as if these

SERVING IN AND THROUGH THE CHURCH

"Salt," "Light," "City on a hill"—how familiar, yet how arresting in their use by Jesus to show man in his social relations and the obligations which they involve. Salt, curative and preservative. Moral conditions are confessedly unsound. Law and education may palliate, but when these are added the saline influence of good individual lives a cure may be hoped for. Conscience is the light which dispels darkness. Ignorance is profound. The effective means of illumination is the multiplication of good lives. These become like a city on a hill, conspicuous in their very contrast to the low level which prevails.

Two pictures are here in one. One is the ideal which merely to be happy but to learn as Jesus taught and illustrated in his own person. The other is the realization of that ideal in the Apostolic church. The character, as well, especially the Lord's Supper. The members continued steadily, day after day, "steadfastly." They were earnest. They were communists, not after teaching of the postles and in their companionship. They said in wealth by the order of Marx, but of Christ, "nobody ought to have anything until everybody had enjoyed the 'agapa,' the feast of love, the simple, frugal meal in contrast to the glutinous and bibulous banquet then universal. They were a praying people. Their devotions were not merely secret but public as well. It was not just tar, then each lights the other's candle. Harry Luder once watched a lamp lighter create an avenue of light and remarked that the first light the world had was the lamp that Jesus lit. There is no ostentation in the shining of the Christian. One says light houses don't ring bells or fire cannons to attract attention to their shining. They just shine. The Christian shines to the glory of God not of himself.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S DEVOTIONAL SERVICE.

February 20, 1927 Isaiah LX II 5-11. Motto: Citizen: A member of the state or nation. One bound to the state by reciprocal allegiance; on the one hand and protection on the other. Century Dictionary.

OUR DUTY AS CHRISTIAN CITIZENS

The very word "Citizen" is significant. The term which designates dwellers in cities has passed to people everywhere who acknowledge their allegiance to the nation. But in point of fact more than half of the whole population is in the cities and towns. Once the city looked to the rural parts to help govern itself. The "Upstate" vote was the saving of it. That day is past. Now as the city goes the whole country goes. Prayerful watchfulness is the Christian's duty. The uplifting of the nation is based upon the righteousness of the nation. Security and prosperity have no other foundation.

WEDDING AT CHENG TU.

Full of quiet dignity and charm was the wedding recently solemnized at Hart College of the West China Union University, Chengtu, when Miss Laura Elva Tindale was united in marriage to Mr. Earl Wyn Bolton. The bride, whose home is in Chatsworth, Ontario, has been a member of the Women's Missionary Society of the United Church of Canada, and has been engaged in teaching at Chengtu. The groom is a member of the firm of the W. H. Bolton Company, with headquarters in Shanghai.

UNDER THE STUDY LAMP

Profit and loss! Salt is good and useful. But it can deteriorate. It is susceptible to atmospheric changes and is easily adulterated. "Light" shows the way and adds much so that it can be darkened, so an eye is to be kept on this debt side. The Christian is "to make good."... The primitive Church was an astonishing phenomenon. It was Salt, Light, City on a Hill. In the primitive Church it prospered because it was generous. It lost its life in giving, but gained its life by doing so. The Chinese have a proverb which says "We only keep what we let loose"... Again these

Concert At York

Of concerts in York, there have been quite a few. To hear of one there, is not at all new. But the one that was held there just last Wednesday night, was so very unusual, I feel I must write.

It seems that the Parsonage board of Trustees. That body of men who are busy as bees. Decided, in Parsonage, a furnace to put; Instead of baseburners, queen-heaters and soot.

Said one, "for this heater, we'll all have to pay. Can someone suggest a good easy way?" "We'll get up a concert," they said, "let us work Twixt Marshfield, Brackley, Dunstaffnage and York."

Twas therefore agreed by one and by all They'd hold the affair on the 9th. in the hall. So the night came around, as nights always do. I got there myself and I hope you did too.

Irving Thompson and Gordon were placed by the door. To give you a greeting, and money to lower. Twas well that the doormen were not scared of work. For they didn't have even a chance for to shrirk!

The hall was packed tight when the Chairman arose, Mr. Gibson, it was, in his very best clothes; 'Tis now after eight—the stage is all set— We'll open our programme with Marshfield's quartette."

So Emma and Jessie, the Parson, All sang, and for singing, a clapping they got, Dot MacDonald recited as only she can. And told of her method of getting a man.

Then out stepped a lady—'twas "Jo' Allen's wife," Such a sight you never did see in your life; Just what she had on I cannot describe. But she looked like a relic of some family tribe!

Her account of her journey through one of the storied, and urged them not to be unduly influenced by big business interests, which "invariably opposed any measure for reform."

Who played it as only a true artist could. The clapping and cheering had scarce died away. When out stepped Burdette, as ever so gay. He sang "Mang the Heather" and "Good Sound Advice," To hear him alone was worth quite a price.

Then came a step dance by our friend, Peter Proud— An item like that always takes with the crowd. Mr. Sellick sang very sweetly, "My Wild Irish Rose," And you couldn't help liking the encore he chose.

Another Solo from Marshfield was heard. By Roland, of course—a voice like a bird. Mrs. Stead took the organ, Mr. Sellick the fiddle. While Fanny with "Uke" sat right down in the middle!

The three played together—it sounded like more. So by way of hard clapping we got an encore. Then out stepped our Arthur, that comical boy. To hear him recite 's surely a joy.

And "Tom" sang a solo "A Wee Cottage Small" And was forced to respond, he received such a call. "Long came Ernest from Marshfield, and brought down the house.

With his vivid description of chasing a mouse. Three "niggers" from Brackley were also quite good. And acted exactly as real niggers would. Then to finish the programme Burdette's voice did roam. And encored, sang "Show me the Way to Go Home."

He brought out the boxes and each one did sell. How much money was made. I really can't tell. But it was a success, of that I do know. As the smiles of the Trustees quite plainly did show.

The ladies came forth, and the tea they did pour. And every one ate 'til they they could eat no more. Then some went to North, some to South, East and West. Each one to the place which they thought was the best;

SMILES

LONDON, Feb. 15. — Lady Astor turned on her own party leaders in the House of Commons tonight and declared that she was "bitterly disappointed at the King's speech." She voiced suspicion about the Government's intention to grant equal franchise to women, an issue on which the Baldwin Ministry, she said, was "pledged up to the hilt." "Women were the best supporters of the Government in the last election," she went on, "and I ask plainly whether the Government means business or not." Lady Astor charged the Ministry with showing little vision, and urged them not to be unduly influenced by big business interests, which "invariably opposed any measure for reform."
