THE SEA HAWK

Marzak, however, seemed but indifferently interested; his eyes continued to stare toward the palmetto tree as if he were waiting for something to happen. "You will care for yourself most dutifully and pity yourself most poignantly, I suspect from experience. This odds you will not live and that is my chief regret. I would you had my blade by the mainmast. At length, with a show to keep you alive in this boat, another word to Sakr-el-Bahr, he made his way about, and flung himself down under the awning, beside his father. Asad sat there in a moody abstraction, already regretting that he should have lent an ear to Fenizella to the extent of coming upon this voyage and assured by now that at least there was no cause to mistrust Sakr-el-Bahr. Marzak came to revive that drooping mistrust. But the moment was ill-chosen, and at the first words he uttered on the subject he was growled into silence by his sire.

"Thou dost but voice thine own malice," Asad rebuked him. "And I am proven a fool in that I have permitted the malice of others to urge me in this matter. No more, I say."

Thereupon Marzak fell silent and sulked his eyes over following Sakr-el-Bahr, who had descended the three steps from the poop to the gangway and was pacing slowly down between the foremast and the mainmast. The corsair was supremely ill at ease, as a man must be who has some fear to conceal, and who begins to think that he may have been betrayed. Yet who was there could have betrayed him? But three men aboard that vessel knew his secret—Ali, his lieutenant, Jasper, and the Italian Viglietto. And Sakr-el-Bahr would have staked all his possessions that neither Ali nor Viglietto would have betrayed him, whilst he was fairly confident that in his own interests Jasper also must have kept faith. Yet Marzak's allusion to that patient bote had filled him with an indignation that sent him now in quest of his Italian boatswain whom he trusted above all others.

"Viglietto," said he, "is it possible that I have been betrayed to the Basha?"

Viglietto looked up sharply at the question, then smiled with confidence. They were standing alone by the bulwarks on the waist-deck.

"Touching what we carry yonder?" quoth he, his glance shifting to the bulk "Impossible. If Asad had known he would have betrayed it before we left Algiers, or else he would never guard of his own."

"What need of bodyguard for him?" returned Sakr-el-Bahr. "If it should come to grips between us as well, it may if what I suspect be true—there is no doubt as to the side upon which the corsairs would range themselves."

"Is there not?" quoth Viglietto, a smile upon his swarthy face. "Be not so sure. These men have most of them followed thee into a score of fights, to them thou art the Basha, their natural leader."

"Maybe. But their allegiance belongs to Asad-ed-Din, the exalted of Allah. Did it come to a choice between us their faith would be true to me, I stand beside him in spite of any past bond that may have existed between them and me."

"Yet there were some who murmured when thou wert superseded in the command of this expedition," Viglietto informed him. "I doubt not that many would be influenced by their faith, but many would stand by thee against the Grand Sultan himself. 'And do not forget,' he added, instinctively lowering his voice, 'that many of us are renegades who know myself and thee, who would never know thy moment's doubt if it came to a choice of sides. But I hope,' he ended in another tone, 'there is no such danger here.'"

"And so do I, in all faith," replied Sakr-el-Bahr with fervor. "I am unpeasy, and I must know where I stand if the worst takes place, to thou amongst the men, Viglietto, and probe their real feelings, gauge their humor and endeavor to ascertain upon what numbers I may count if I have to declare war upon Asad or if he declares it upon me. Be cautious."

Viglietto closed one of his black eyes portentously.

"Depend upon it," he said, "I'll bring you word anon."

On that they parted, Viglietto to make his way to the poop and there engage his investigations, Sakr-el-Bahr slowly to retrace his steps to the gangway he passed, and looked down at the dejected, white-fleshed slave who sat shackled there. He smiled cruelly, his own anxieties forgotten in the savagery of vengeance.

"So you have tasted the whip already," he said in English, "but that is nothing to what is yet to come. You are in luck that there is a wind today. It will not always be so. Soon shalt you learn what it was that I endured by your contriving."

Lionel looked up at him with big, hard, blood-injected eyes. He wanted to curse his brother, yet was he too overwhelmed by the sense of the fitness of this punishment.

"For myself I care nothing," he replied.

"But you will, sweet brother," was Prince Edward—Wed. Thurs. Nov. 5-6.
