black scurf and stem canker, and black leg. This is because the organisms, causing these three diseases, are normal inhabitants of the soil. Therefore, the amount of disease which occurs must depend very largely on the infestation of the soil and environmental conditions, and not on the amount of the organism which may be added by the seed piece.

REDUCING DISEASE OF POTATOES

(Experimental Farms Note) During recent years, experimental results secured by the Division of Botany of the Federal Department of Agriculture, have suggested important limitations of tuber treatment in controlling such prevalent diseases as common scab, and, to some extent, black scurf, and black leg. This is because the organisms, causing these three diseases, are normal inhabitants of the soil. Therefore, the amount of disease which occurs must depend very largely on the infestation of the soil and environmental conditions, and not on the amount of the organism which may be added by the seed piece.

Old soils are apt to carry a greater infestation of these parasites than virgin soil does. Therefore, it would be safer to disinfect tubers when using virgin soils. Of course, seed treatment will effectively dispose of the fungi which are on the surface of the tuber in the case of common scab and black scurf, but it cannot hope to kill the bacteria which cause black leg, because these are within the tuber. With regard to the virus disease, tuber treatment cannot be effective, because the causal agent persists in the juice of the plant and the tuber. Present evidence suggests that, in the absence of a suitable resistant variety, crop rotation is a desirable method to reduce common scab, black scurf,

Probably the best method for reducing black leg, is to plant tubers that are free from this disease. The only method now available to reduce and control the highly important virus diseases (which cause the stock to "run out," is to use seed free from these diseases. The Federal Department of Agriculture, through its inspection system, makes available seed potatoes, certified with regard to disease content.
