ARMOR FOR SOLDIERS URGES CONAN DOYLE

LONDON, July 26.—Sir Arthur Conan Doyle writes in The Times advocating the use of protective armor for soldiers attacking over open ground. He says:—

"As a man faces the hostile rifle fire his forehead and heart are the only points presented which are certainly vital. The former would be protected by such a helmet as the French have evolved; the second should be covered by a curved plate of highly tempered steel, not more than a foot in diameter. With this simple light equipment the two centres of life are safe. "A wound in the abdomen is no longer certain death, thanks to the advances of surgery, but a third curve of steel strapped across from the ribs to the hip bones would afford protection. "But granting that individual life would be saved, this does not bear upon the capture of positions, since would be saved, this does not bear so many would fall wounded that the weight of the attack would be spent before the stormers reached the trenches. For this, armor which would give complete protection is needed, and since the weight of this is more than a man can readily carry, it must be pushed in front upon wheels.

The "Tortoise" Advance

"I picture a great number of plates held together like the shields of the Romans, pushed by men who would crouch behind them.

"When one is disabled it can readily be dropped and the gap closed. Others could be fixed sideways upon wheels and used upon the flank of the advance to prevent enveloping fire.

"One 'tortoise' would attract the concentrated fire of the artillery, but as each company or platoon forms its own, these numerous armor-plated bodies could rush with small loss over the space already cleared as far as possible of obstacles and to have some chance of reaching the enemy's line, not as an exhausted fragment, but a vigorous storming party with its numbers intact."
