MANY WOULD SHARE RICH VISITOR'S WEALTH. PARIS, Dec. 5—A rich Argentine, Senor Ramon Barrera, is now in Paris, and the accidental disclosure in the press that he is matrimonially inclined has led to a perfect deluge of letters from French women of all ages and classes, desirous of detaching him from his present state of single blessedness. An enterprising newspaper man managed to secure a number of these letters from Senor Barrera, and their publication affords curious sidelights on the French feminine nature. Mile. Yvonne X. says she has always dreamed of living in Paris, and asks for an interview with Senor Barrera. In a postscript she begs pardon for the trouble she is giving him. "Laura" begins her letter: "Very dear Sir,—This little missive will doubtless cause you a slight surprise, but I feel drawn towards you by true friendship." She goes on to say that she dare not come to see him in Paris dressed as she is, but only waits for him to send $100 in order to "buy out" the affection of a heart that loves you well. A widow writes that she does not know what it is—instinct, perhaps—which impels her to write, and, being a widow with a small family to bring up, she would be very grateful for the loan of $50. Of course the concierge, who is always mixed up in every Parisian affair, also appears, with, however, a purely business proposition. One of the fraternality societies that instead of running about the hotels, Ramon would be much better off in a snug little apartment, just such a one as she happens to have vacant—$75 a year and a penny by steamboat to Paris. There are letters in every key—some ridiculous, some romantic, and some pathetic in an appeal for money from the man who seems to be the best and good-hearted. One letter is really charming in its naivete. It is from a working girl who finds dress expensive, and says it is all her parents can do to pay for food and lodging. "It is very painful, Monsieur, to be badly dressed among a number of girls who are prettily frocked, although quite as good as they are in other respects. In the newspaper I read that you gave a magnificent costume to—, who has returned it to me. I am the same age, and she and I take exactly the same size. Oh, sir, how I should like to have that costume! It is a little thing for you, but what a joy for my family and for me! When I could say that I was wearing dresses made for a rich Argentine, etc." These are only a few specimens from a whole sheaf of letters, which show rather painfully how keenly French women readers follow the events of the day in the newspapers. There is, in fact, material for a dozen novels in the love letters of Ramon Barrera.
