worked well, too, for the Second and the Third Divisions were largely the result of this system. Then, came the plan of last winter by which small units were raised in rural centres and allowed to remain there, in billets and what training they could get, until spring came and the men were gathered into the summer training camps. Recruiting has recently languished for several reasons. Now comes the territorial system. Under it the Canadian will volunteer for service with the corps at the front which represents his district, in fact he will know where he is going from the minute he starts. First he will have some training in his Canadian district; then he will have some more training in England with the reserve battalion representing his Canadian district; finally he will get some fighting at the front with the battalion composed chiefly of men from his home town; in this way the neighborly spirit is being introduced into this system. Unneighborly business of war. It is expected that the new plan will work well at both ends. In Canada each territorial district will seek to do as well as its neighbor; in producing men at the front the representatives of districts will feel that they personally are upholding the honor of the territory they represent.

ed in these days might fall into last effective conduct is not compatible with normal democratic government of the nations involved. It demands a dictatorship. This is one of the arguments in favor of the allied policy of uprooting the Prussian military caste as an essential first step to enduring peace.
Mr. R. B. Bennett, Chairman of the National Service Commission, speaking in the west recently, dwelt on what might happen to Canada in the event of a German triumph in the present world-war. Reminders are often very useful, in fact everyone is the better for them, but I fancy there are few people in Canada who do not now realize what would happen to this country in the event of a German victory. The only reason the people of Canada have been so complaisant during the past thirty months is that they have not felt that the German cause will be successful. Canadian faith in an ability of the allies to win out is positive. This faith is based on the surplus of man-power possessed by the allies, as well as on the surplus of dollar power of the allies. It is based, on sentiment, on the impregnability of the Empire. It might perhaps be better for things at the front if Canadians had a little less supreme confidence. Out here we are so little affected by the great struggle that we find it hard to understand the awfulness of the thing that is going on in Europe. If we thought harder we might all do more.

ENLIST! ENLIST!
Be fair! Enlist! Enlist!
You never will be missed
From dances, moving picture shows, and teas,
But at the world's elect Will miss you and respect
The motive that has sent you overseas.
Perhaps it is your girl Who keeps you in a whirl
Of doubt and apprehension, love and hate.
My lad, be brave, be strong,
You may not leave her long,
And if she loves you truly she will wait.
Or, maybe, mother, old Has got too firm a hold On childhood's happy period, long since past.
Be tender, but be true
To all that's best to you

And surely she will let you go at last.
Or, is it wifey, dear,
So full of love and fear
To keep you home does everything she can
But duty's call is loud,
And later she'll be proud That you have gone and proved your self a man.
So, take it all in all
'Tis best to heed the call And go and do what other lads have done.
Some day you will rejoice
That you have made the choice And helped to win the war against the Hun.
—Laura A. Ridley.
Individuality in hair dressing grows more pronounced. Some really artistic coiffures, enough on present lines not to look odd and curiously in character with the faces they frame. Has a girl one or two Eastern features she seeks to accentuate them. Has she large dark eyes, a Spanish comb helps the effect. No longer is the Marcel wave kept in its pristine severity. The hair is waved to be sure and then it is combed out just enough to lose the artificiality of it.

When convivial joy was shut off here and hereabouts something like six months ago, and with one long swipe of prohibition red tape several thousand "whistles" were dried there were those among the legislated teetotalers who were quite sure they would never smile again. But today these clumps are laughing up their sleeves. The tea-bred folk who supported the prohibition measure are apparently skirting a desert in which there is not one ounce of the stimulating Ceylon, Oolong, Java and Orange Pekoe. If these people are to be believed, are fast going the way of Mum's Extra Dry and Johnnie Walker. The submarine have by the tea-tossers out of brewing, and if the policy of "frightfulness" is continued Canada may before long be face to face with a thirst that will parch even the W. C. T. U. Of course there will still be peppermint, ginger, and senna tea, but none of these have the same living effects on the Canadian constitution. The Canadians as everybody knows, demands that his tea be rich and black with few "visitors" in the cup. The favorite brew in Canada, it is said by those in the know, comes from Ceylon. The Suez Canal has been closed to all tea ships now, and this is equivalent to cutting the number of ships in half because it takes twice as long for the ships to reach London going around the Cape. Canada is now largely depending upon teas coming from the Islands of the Pacific and China, but they are for the most part green, with the exception of a little coming from China, and it is well known that green tea stands in the same class as two per cent. of the men with an Oolong thirst. Seriously speaking it is beginning to look as if Canada can soon hang her teacup in the curio closet with the stein, if present conditions hold out.
In the course of his impressive speech in Parliament on the danger of trying to win a victory on paper instead of by action in the field, it cannot be denied that there has been widespread tendency to argue away facts by the use of language, especially in the earlier stages of the war. This war is so tremendous an event that to confuse any particular feature of it in a mass of verbiage becomes easy. It is difficult to conceive of anything the enemy could do that some of our war experts would not turn into an argument to prove conclusive German defeat. So even of the war has been allowed to escape the incurably optimistic analysis of certain observers. Winning the war on paper or otherwise than by action is a dangerous practice, and losing the war on paper is simply a disaster. There are so many factors in the conflict spread over so vast an area and with so much depending on the political situation and so little information available, that logical reasoning is constantly being held up to derision by succeeding events. In a world of democratic nations, war as it is conducted
