The latest news, first of all. The missing girl from Souris who had been decoyed to Pictou by parties from the mainland left for her home yesterday in charge of her mother after having arrived in Charlottetown on Saturday night. Additional particulars of the affair show that an American, with a woman whom he claimed to be his wife and another young man had been travelling through the island for several days ostensibly selling eye-glasses. In Charlottetown the unmarried man picked up the Souris girl, who was working in the city. He had got her address in some way and had been sending her post-cards from the States for a long time, so that when he reached Charlottetown he had little difficulty in ripening the acquaintance made by mail. He offered the girl a position in an eye-glass factory in the States at high wages and offered to pay her way there. She accepted the offer and the party of four started for the States leaving the island by the Northumberland. The Pictou Advocate describes what happened in Pictou as follows: On the way across the Strait one of the officers of the boat who had his suspicions of the American got into conversation with the girl and from what she told him came to the conclusion that she was in a fair way to become a white slave. As soon as the boat docked he told what he knew to a couple of Pictou men, who at once conferred with Officer Morrison. That night the man and wife went to a boarding house in Pictou while the unmarried man and the island girl went to an hotel, registering separately, the girl putting down her own name. On the following day the man spent over $30 on the girl, buying her a waterproof coat, a hat and dress. The other couple went out to Scotsburn, returning in the evening. On the second night Mr. Morrison took his chance by the boarding house, where he was staying and where he and his wife had stayed while here two years before and introduced Mr. Chum as a friend of his. The friend then introduced the island girl as his wife and they took a room together. The following day the girl's sister came over from Charlottetown and tried to induce her to return, but to no purpose. The sister then went back to the island to get the parents from Souris and, in the meantime, Officer Morrison had a talk with the girl and told her what she might expect when she got to the States. His talk had an effect on her, for that evening she quarrelled with the man and left him. After the trio saw they were suspected, the young fellow told the girl he would marry her and the other couple professed to be horrified at the state of affairs, which they said they had never dreamed of. Fearing arrest, the girl's lover, if such we can call him, attempted to get a team to drive himself and the girl to Scotsburn Thursday night, so that they could take the early train for Boston. On the girl's refusing to accompany him he tried to get a team for himself and, failing in this, walked out of town. The other couple went to New Glasgow. It is learned that the young fellow had the addresses of a number of island girls and had been sending letters and post-cards to them.

worth remembering. It was a special prescription, given by a successful business man to a young man who had considerable ability and the full confidence of his friends. "Take things easier," the business man said to him. "Don't worry. Just stick to your work. Do the most important thing first, and then the next; generally the things you don't do aren't worth doing. What you think you ought to do first you want to do up to the hilt, and do it quick, and then forget it."

It is safe to say that this young man—or any other young man—following this advice might win distinction for himself in almost any line of endeavor. The trouble with most of us is that we lack knowledge as to the best and quickest methods of accomplishing a desired object. Instead of going ahead and attaining results that are worth while, we putter about over a dozen different things, and when the day of the week has passed little, if anything, has actually been accomplished.

In coming to his desk at the beginning of the week most business men face an accumulation of affairs that call for more or less speedy attention. There is the extra large Monday morning mail, with all its letters to be read and answered, and all their details to be looked after. In addition, there may be a host of matters that have been carried over from the previous week, and in the midst of this complicated array of details the man does not know which way to turn.

Of course, there are men who do not suffer from such experiences, but they are the persons who, like the business man, have mastered the art of attending to details. And the way that this man suggests is about the best method by which such work can be accomplished. It is by taking the most important thing first, and then the thing that is next in importance, that the heaped-up mass of business can most quickly and efficiently be got out of the way.

A man can do more work by giving his entire attention to it for a few hours during the day than he can if he lets it hang around for weeks. By concentrating all the faculties of his mind upon a given task it is soon accomplished, while the man who has only half his mind on his job, and that a more or less vagrant mind, gets practically nothing done. Have you ever noticed the confirmed putterer at his work? If not, you should take advantage of your next opportunity to study the phenomenon that you may add him to your list of horrible examples.

I have one of these men in mind—a man whose desk is always covered with things to which he intends to give his attention some time—the "some time" that has been so long postponed. Even now, with his accumulation of duties before him, he does not succeed in clearing away of it away, for, instead of selecting one thing and getting it out of the way as quickly as possible, he spends five minutes on one thing, then five minutes on another, until the day has gone, and no single thing has been quite finished. To watch him, it seems as if he could not keep his mind upon any one thing for more than three or four minutes at a stretch. At the expiration of this time some other matter obtrudes itself, and there is nothing to be done but drop the first thing and take up the second matter.

There are plenty of these putterers—both men and women. To hear them talk, or to see them after the day's work is ended, you might deem them the most overworked individuals in existence. Tired—worn-out? Of course they are weary—twice as exhausted as the man who has by proper methods accomplished many things. Moreover, the reason for this is not hard to find, for, as this business man said in the newspaper article that I read:

"The way to get along is to work up to the limit and then stop. A man can get further in the long run walking three and a half miles an hour for eight hours a day than he can by going two miles an hour for sixteen hours in twenty-four. The first way promptly introduces himself as her husband to the lady, whom he had spent so many years in avoiding. The records of Gretta Green furnish many romantic stories of runaway schoolboys who have found happiness over the border. In June, 1804, society was startled and considerably amused by the news that Mr. Daway, a young Etonian of eighteen, had eloped with a dowager lady (whose name is suppressed in the contemporary accounts) old enough to be his grandmother.

A remarkable feature of this romance, says The London Times, "is the fact that the dowager was, as a girl, unsuccessfully wooed by the boy's grandfather, and is actually his god-mother to his own father. The runaway couple posted the whole way from London to Gretta Green, covering the long journey in four days and nights, and are, it is said, now spending their honeymoon in the Highlands of Scotland. Meanwhile, Lord —, the dowager's son, is impatiently awaiting the bridegroom's return to challenge him to a duel."

At the Yarmouth Y. M. C. A. Boys' Camp, held at Tusket Falls in August, I found MINARD'S LINIMENT beneficial for sun burn, an immediate relief for colic and tooth-ache.

SCHOOLBOY HUSBANDS. Philander C. Knox, the youthful son of the well known American Secretary of State, who has recently made himself famous by running away from school and wedding a pretty little drapery assistant, is by no means the first schoolboy who has left his books to indulge in the forbidden luxury of a honeymoon. In the so-called "good old times" husbands who were still wrestling with Caesar and Euclid, if not as common as they are today, were by no means a novelty. Indeed one reads not rarely of a young man who had not reached his seventh birthday plighting his troth at the altar to a bride whose summers only numbered three, and who proved rather a troublesome charge to her nurse. In another case the young heir of an ancient peerage was summoned from Eton to assume the unexpected role of bridegroom to the seven-year-old daughter of another peer, whose hand and fortune his father had won in a game of cards.

Immediately after the ceremony the reluctant bridegroom, who had taken a violent dislike to the unprepossessing young lady, was packed off again to school, while the bride was sent back to her nursery in tears. For many years neither saw the other. The youthful lord finished his school and university career, and went for a prolonged tour around the world, without exhibiting the least desire to meet again the unattractive young lady whom he had married against his will.

On his return to England he chanced to go to a theatre where, in a box, his eyes fell on the most entrancing vision of female loveliness he had ever seen. "Who is that lovely young lady?" he asked a neighbor.

"Why, sir, don't you know?" was the answer. "That's Lady R.—the most beautiful woman in England and the toast of the town!" The "ugly duckling" of ten years ago had blossomed into the most perfect womanly loveliness; and before many minutes had passed his lordship proudly introduced himself as her husband to the lady, whom he had spent so many years in avoiding.
