VACATIONS AT HOME

Two neighbors in a small city, each with a large family of children used to go on little picnics together, taking all the youngsters with them. It did them some good, but one of them, Mrs. Martin, felt that there was a better plan, and she made the suggestion that she should take care of all the children while Mrs. Blake reeted at home, or spent the day with a friend. It seemed as if this was throwing a heavy burden on Mrs. Martin, but she thought eight children were as easy to look after as four. She got through the day very well, while Mrs. Blake had a happy visit with her mother in a neighboring town.

"It was so nice to be taken care of and coddled all day just as I coddle the children," she commented. "No hungry demands for dinner, no querulous questions about where caps and shoes or hat had gone; just tender questions as to whether I was in a comfortable chair and what kind of pie I would like I forgot I had any children. I felt ready for two weeks of noise and torn stockings and bruises when I got home."

Mrs. Martin spent her holiday with two maiden ladies. Her vacation was that the peace and order were delightful; it was such a relief to see furniture with no scratches, without the prints of little moist, dirty hands. It was a relief to sit down with no thought of a meal to get, and to be refused when she offered to wash the dishes. It was equally a relief to hear no childish shouts or cries. She went home sure that she loved her children more than ever because she had spent a severe day with people who had no more to do with children than they had with chimpanzees.

Mrs. Blake and Mrs. Martin practised this plan from May until November. Neither of the women ever neglected to take the fortnightly holiday, and they always contrived to take it away from their own houses. They had discovered the important fact that change is an essential element of rest. In the autumn they looked fresher and felt better than they had for years. They had no shrinkings from the autumn dressmaking and tailoring; they had no nervous headaches; no morning when it seemed impossible to face the wear and tear of the day. Their careful planned occasional vacations had brought fresh mental and spiritual health.

The girl or woman who lives in a small town or in the country and who cannot get away for a long holiday, sometimes finds it more difficult to take the occasional daily change than a city woman does. The city woman has the parks and suburbs, but the dweller in the little town or country has often nowhere to go except to another small town or another stretch of country. It may not strike her that this would be any real holiday. But it is—"Woman's
