his direction and keen interest made rapid strides. Although, owing to failing health, he had partially retired from active clerical work, he accepted the chapeantry of the City Hospital, a position which he filled with credit to himself and profit to the institution. It was largely owing to his initiation and the trustees of the Parish, Messrs. Cornelius McLellan, Emanuel McLellan, Frank Gillis and John Kilbride, Lot 11. A Schoolboy's Essay on Insurance

The following is a schoolboy's essay on "Insurance: What it means," which won a $100.00 prize offered recently by the "Daily Field," San Francisco.

"Insurance is the greatest asset of the business world today. It affords every degree of protection, safeguard and assurance against loss it is possible to give. It enters into every field of action in life; it ranges from religion to gambling.

Insurance means peace of mind and freedom from worry, as it shifts the burden of responsibility to those who are best able to bear it.

The greatest constructive factor in the world today is insurance. With its recompense for loss, it encourages enterprise and construction; and to protect itself it shows the way. Our great office buildings are erected on principles governed by the experience of insurance. Many features of architectural construction are dictated by the fire underwriters. Our great ships are built and navigated under rules laid down by marine insurers. And life insurance! that greatest and most far reaching arm for the protection of the family, what a world of suffering and misery it prevents! By not accepting risks on men and women who are not in good physical condition, it encourages habits for the promotion of health, improving and raising the standard of living.

The fact that one carries insurance to protect life or business is the best answer to the great cry for "Safety First."

Insurance has a tremendous power for good. It comes as a godsend to the widow, the merchant, or to the aged when untimely overtakes them or life's burdens become too heavy. Of all the complex issues man has to face in the intricate business, economical and social relations which surround him, the field of insurance stands next to his government and his own desires. In protecting his efforts and ambitions, and with its dependable safeguards assuring him absolute reliability. It is a guide between the Scylla and Charybdis of life, steering the people on their perilous courses.

It encourages thrift and promotes the welfare of the family, for once a man realizes what insurance means the very love for that family urges him on to paths of greater usefulness and success. It lifts burdens of fathers, and helps to educate the care from the heads of worrying children, giving them greater opportunities. It makes mothers happier freeing them from anxiety. It protects employer and employee, standing as a bond of faith between them.

With the issues of supply and demand, it enters as part of the bit and reins to guide and check the high cost of living. It is the safety valve in an age of extravagance as its conservation and prudence tend to promote rational living.

Look around! See the buildings! Everything you behold is represented through insurance on one form or another. See the people! Everyone you meet is carrying and paying for some kind of insurance, directly or indirectly.

Wherever you go, wherever you are, whatever you do, life's uncertainty, with the future an unknown quantity, is the greatest argument for insurance that can be presented.

For insurance protection of all kinds at lowest rates consistent with absolute security, consult.
