

PRICELESS

LEAVE YOUR PLATE IN MILTON WHILE YOU SLEEP OR WHILE YOU DRESS

You can't clean false teeth as a woman cleans a floor—by scrubbing and brushing. It's crude, costly and ineffective. Much better let Milton make a perfect job of them while you're sleeping or dressing. Either way they're cleaned as nothing else can clean them. No harm to the denture and every germ killed—ask your dentist. Both these methods are explained in the little book you'll find with the bottle.

Sold by your dealer—35¢, 65¢, and $1 a bottle.

The GOLDEN GIRL

THE BOYS RETURN

Constance and So-so were on the landing field. Jerry and Fred were due at any moment. Constance had flown the Ice maiden over and parked it on the field.

"They'll see it when they come down and know that I'm here," she told So-so.

"Jerry would expect you anyway," So-so said.

"He might but when he knows I'm pretty busy—the party season is on and there's a certain amount of entertaining I have to do, you know for father's sake, although it bores me to extinction."

Presently they saw a ship swim into sight from the west. It circled the field and coasted down to land.

"There they come, Jerry's piloting. Constance stood relaxed, waiting for the men to step out of the cockpit and cross the field.

"Are you as cool as you look?" So-so asked.

"Nary a heart-throb, you old sentimentalist—do you think I ought to run over and fall on Jerry's neck?" She waved a friendly hand at the two men, who were stamping the stiffness of their long flight out of their legs. They came toward the girl at a rapid walk.

"Some reception committee," Jerry called. "Welcome the heroes home, pin a laurel wreath on our brow—hello, Constance. You're looking great. So-so—the same old So-so." He shook hands with both them.

"Can we have some food, So-so?" Fred gave her hand a squeeze. "Is your car here, Connie? Let's dash into the village for a steak, the four of us."

"Sorry, Fred, I left it home and brought the Ice maiden over. But my old Mammy Chloe is over at So-so's house staying there, and she'll get us some dinner, I know."

"I can't leave the Crow'snest right now," So-so said. "There'll be a mob in for supper in a few minutes, but go on over to my house, the rest of you, and I'll come when I can."

"Fine. I'll have Chloe give the boys some coffee or tea and some toast and we'll all have dinner about 7.30."

you can make it by that time, can't you?" Constance alighted one arm through Jerry's and the other through Fred's.

"I reckon I can, as Chloe says. So-so went with them as far as the Crow'snest and then left them. She saw Fred look back over his shoulder as though he would have preferred staying with her. She smiled to herself a little sadly as she went into the Crow'snest. No one had thought of her father apparently. No one missed him excepting herself. Of course she could hardly expect life to stop because she was lonely, but the short memory of her friends accentuated her isolation.

"No kith or kin, save my mother's people in Norway—and they've probably never even heard of me," she thought to herself. Just before she locked the Crow'snest the door opened and Fred came in. "We had some tea, washed up, and then I came back to get you. Wrap up, So-so, there's a bitter wind blowing."

So-so's heart warmed at his thoughtfulness. She clung to his arm and was glad of his presence when they stepped into the night.

"Where'd you get Chloe?" he asked. "She's a scream; she asked us if our feet were wet and wanted us to have a drink from the black bottle she keeps on the kitchen shelf behind the clock."

"She was Connie's old nurse, and Connie sent her to me so I wouldn't be alone. Connie's certainly all there when it comes to kindness, Fred."

"She likes to have her own way though," Fred observed. "And don't forget that she gets a big kick out of doing things for people she likes."

"Why so sour, Fred?" "Nothing special. She rubbed me the wrong way just now when she made Jerry promise to have some things done here that we both think can be done better in the Western plant. Says she is going South in about a month and wants to keep in touch with everything until she goes."

"She probably just wants to be near Jerry."

"Maybe."

"Connie and Jerry are both awfully proud and stubborn, you know," So-so said loyally. "They don't like to show their emotions to everybody."

"I don't think they have any to show," Fred answered. "Why, when we were away Jerry hardly mentioned Constance, unless it was in connection with the flight and I know he only wrote her once. I made him do that. I don't think she wrote to him at all. She did send him a telegram after she got his letter. He said something about instruments being expensive and she telegraphed for him to forget about money, there was plenty of it."

"It's just a different way of doing things—of being in love, I guess," So-so insisted. But her voice was troubled.

"Maybe you're right, but, believe me, So-so, that isn't the way I'm going to treat my girl when she finally says yes."

They had reached the house now and went up the steps where the first thin snowfall of the season made slip-
