Near heat-beater! Really a delight on a sultry day to dip into a bowl of crisp, cool Kellogg's Corn Flakes. No wonder your family's flavour-favourite is Kellogg's. If you've opened your last package, better order more tomorrow. Made by Kellogg's in London, Canada.

BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

AN OLD TRICK WELL PLAYED

So be a way succeeds for you. What matter be it old or new. —Reddy Fox.

Rerry Junior, smartest of the five children of Mr. and Mrs. Reddy Fox, sat in his favorite place in the upper part of the Old Pasture. From a big flat rock partly surrounded by bushes he could see a long way in several directions. It was a wonderful place to see with small chance of being seen. It was his favorite lookout.

The Merry Little Breezes, children of Old Mother West Wind had brought him a sound that excited him and at the same time filled him with dread. It was the baying of a Hound, as the barking of a certain kind of Dog following a trail is called. He had heard it behind him once. That was why he had a feeling of dread now. If he should live to be as old as his father now was, he would hear that sound many times. He would hear it with less and less dread, but never with less excitement.

From the lookout he had watched his father jump up on an old stone wall, run along on it nearly to one end, run back to where he had landed on it, make a long jump and run to the other end. There he had made as long a leap as he could up in some bushes resting and watching.

The Dog was in sight now. His voice was deep and clear and eager. The Merry Little Breezes brought it steadily to the pointed black ears of the young Fox. The black ears lay strong, easy to follow, and the Dog was telling all who might listen that he could and would run that Fox down. Just listening gave the young Fox a shivery feeling. He wondered if his father down there in the bushes had that feeling, too. How long would it be before his father had to start running again, and where would he go then? It was too warm for long running and both the Big River and Laughing Brook, where a trail could be ended in friendly water, were a long way from where his father now was.

There was no pause in the steady triumphant baying of the Dog until he reached the stone wall. There he stopped barking. The scent ended where Reddy had left the ground in his long leap to the top of the wall. The Dog began running from side to side his nose to the ground searching for the lost scent. He worked back and forth in a small circle. He whined with impatience. The watching young Fox chuckled. His father had been smart to make that long jump to the top of the wall. He would remember that trick. Yes, sir he would remember that.

Just then the Dog put his fore feet up on the wall and reaching over sniffed at the top. He lifted his head and bayed in triumph. Then he scrambled over the wall expecting to find the scent on the other side. Of course he didn't. He hunted there as carefully as he had on the first side. Once more he stood up on his hind legs to reach up and smell of the top of the wall. The scent was there. This time he remained on the wall instead of scrambling over. He followed the scent on top of the wall.

He was a smart Dog. It wasn't easy for him to run along on the wall as it had been for Reddy. He jumped down and ran along beside the wall, now and then stopping to reach up and sniff at the top. At last when he reached up and sniffed there was no scent. He stopped barking and again scrambled up on the wall. Slowly, carefully, he walked back and found the scent where it had been on top of the wall. Where had that Fox gone? How could he have gone without leaving scent? Perhaps he had tried the old trick of jumping as far off the wall as he could. The Dog jumped down on one side and circled carefully. No scent. He did the same thing on the other side. Still no scent.

He climbed up on the wall and followed the scent back to where it began. There it ended again. He went a few steps farther, but not quite far enough. He turned back and again followed the scent to where it had ended near the end of the wall. Once more he circled on both sides. He whined his disappointment. The watching young Fox chuckled and felt like hugging himself, but of course he couldn't do that. How smart his father was! What a trick! It was one to remember.

And from the clump of bushes in which he was comfortably curled up Reddy Fox watched and grinned.

The next story: "Crazy Like a Fox."

One Error Too Many

The defenders could have survived one error in today's deal, but a second one proved fatal.

South dealer. Both sides vulnerable.

West, not regarding his club suit very highly, opened the heart deuce. (This cannot fairly be called an error, since many experts would make the same choice. The heart ace was played, and East "encouraged" his partner by putting on the eight. Declarer now tried a deep diamond finesse, to his own eight and West won with the nine. On the heart continuation, declarer guessed that the finesse would not work and played dummy's king.

Another diamond was led, South smothering the queen with the ace, then leading the diamond four. West won with the king and returned his last heart, East taking the trick.

East shifted to the spade deuce and South made the inspired play of putting on the eight. Declarer now tried a deep diamond finesse, to his own eight and West won with the nine. On the heart continuation, declarer guessed that the finesse would not work and played dummy's king.
