Lonely Parade

By Fannie Hurst

Erna, whose training in a commercial college had been manipulated free of charge by way of a state Senator who had reason to feel kindly toward the Charlottetown, was suddenly lifted out of the waiting list of a Wilmington stenographer and secretarial agency and inducted into Twenty-one East. A poor but proud relation whose duties in her aunt's household ranged from cutting radish rosettes for the Sunday luncheons to carbon copies of contracts, to dictation from Kitty, to plain sewing, to fourth hand at whist, to massage.

The idea of a secretary of all work who might be willing to come into Twenty-one East on a beginning basis of board, lodging and spending money, had been Kitty's. The idea of Erna had been the Charlottetown press, had demurred, but Erna, who knew her aunt but slightly, had turned her near-sighted eyes eagerly upon the opportunity.

"It's impossible for your mother to want anything that I suggest," the Charlottetown had told Erna in their second interview upon the subject. "The mere fact that it comes from me will disqualify it. No use your mother and I meeting. We don't know what to talk about when we do. What's on her mind, boy?"

"I think so, Rolfe. But he's not on mine."

"Well, make sure. All things being equal, marriage is best but if this one isn't the best."

"He isn't, Aunt."

"Well, then, if you can fix it with your mother — and if you can't, well, you are welcome to come on this job for board and keep and enough wage to send your mother half of it every week. Now go home and chew it over with her. She is the master cheever of all time. Whatever you decide between you, suits me."

In the end, never enlarging upon what had taken place at home, Erna arrived at the office with her suitcase and a bag of baggage. It became immediately her weekly task to typewrite a list that went out to all the daily newspapers of the guests present at Sunday luncheons. About one-third of the time, according to the social professional or sensational news value of the guests, they were published. Fitting through these occasions, sitting at table when a minute cancellation caused problems, taking the guests' wraps, cutting stems of the flowers which Kitty had arranged about herself to arrange, answering hurried calls from the limited kitchen force, Erna, lusterless as soot, moved through the background of the household.

That Sunday that Colonel Hoff (the title one of affection bestowed by his friends) came to luncheon, the sole guest, Erna sent out no lists to the papers. The wealthy brewer did not make up a news item worthy of Twenty-one East.

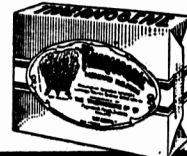

As a matter of fact, however, this Sunday marked an occasion fraught with interest for the three of them. The fifty-nine-year-old city alderman and head of the immense brewery interests, Hoff, Inc., had been following up on more or less recent acquaintance with the Charlottetown with attentions of a marked sort. Potted plants from the Hoff conservatories, cases of famous Hoff brews, hot-house, out of season fruits from the Hoff Tarrytown estate, were daily occurrences. For weeks now that air of excitement lent by arriving messengers and packages had hung over Twenty-one East.

By this time, the intimate perils of the Hoff family, the three concerning the attentions of Hoff to Charlottetown began to take on the edge of caution. You didn't look about the wains mustache or the wains table manners or what Kitty called the wains blood of one who might ultimately become a member of the family. And it was rapidly becoming apparent that the advances of the industrialist-politician were not merely casual salutes at the expense of the Charlottetown's "brewery-Brumme", becoming more veiled and subdued, finally all but subdued.

THERMOGENE MEDICATED WOOL

This luncheon took place on a perfect Palm Sunday that had crept softly and suddenly upon a city still wearing its gaiters. Spring flashed so unexpectedly, spilling such brightness over streets inured to drabness, that the shabbiness of weatherbeaten facades and coal-smoked drapes sprang into high relief. But not along the street of Twenty-one East. The result of a house-to-house canvass by Miss Mullins, uniform-window boxes, bright with hyacinth and tulips, bloomed along the window sills of practically every dwelling on it.

A fine whorl of daffodils, which had been carried in a sheaf of green tissue paper by Colonel Hoff through the bright Palm Sunday morning, occupied the center of the luncheon table.

It was an adventure in agreeableness to luncheon at Twenty-one East on a spring Sunday. Church chimers tilted over the pleasantness. Green smells came up from the patch of back garden. An unseen clock remarked the passing of the half-hour by playing a thin music-box aria from "Aida".

The salad which Kitty mixed at table in a wooden bowl smacked of dandelion and faint garlic. The dressing which she concocted of Roquefort cheese and olive oil, whipped together in a dish of cracked ice, was voted by Hoff, himself a gourmet of parts, to be to the queen's taste. Also, on a day that had turned suddenly balmy you could trust Kitty to serve a candy stripe, strawberry and mint ice cream when originally she had planned apple cobbler and hard sauce.

The something that was to make every kind of occasion, however trivial, that had been touched by the hand of Kitty somewhat of a small adventure, hung over this dining room scene.

AID MEETING

The October meeting of the Western Hospital Ladies' Aid was held in the Nurses' Home on Friday, October 14th at 8 p.m. with the president, Mrs. Bertha Wade presiding.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved. The treasurer reported the sum of $685.00 gross receipts of Exhibition meals.

It was moved and seconded that two letters of sympathy be sent to bereaved members, also a letter of thanks to a friend who helped the Aid in a very special manner on Exhibition Day.

After a brief discussion on means of raising funds it was decided to hold a series of card parties.

A committee was appointed in the charge of the lunch, also to
