NEIL IS ANGRY WITH BARBARA FOR MEDDLING

CHAPTER LXVII.

I never closed my eyes all night. If his business was all as it should be why was Neil so angry because I tried to see his papers? I had not meant to be meddlesome, simply to find something to refute what people were saying about him—if Lorraine Morton and those women I heard talking in the store were telling the truth. And it was strange they should say the same things Mr. Frederick had said so long before.

I recalled the startled unbelief in Neil's voice when he replied to me after I had told him people were saying unkind things about him, and tried to extract a bit of comfort from it. Surely if he had been doing anything very wrong he would not have been so suprised—or so angry. It was I who had made him cross, not the malicious gossip of people who knew nothing of him, his goodness, his generosity. Perhaps I had done wrong to go to his office. It had been done on impulse, because I loved him. I would make him understand that, and he would not be so angry.

Then I wondered what the bookkeeper and the yellow haired stenographer would tell him. I hoped they would not exaggurate my actions. I knew I had acted terribly disappointed, especially when I went back the second time to look at the mail. I had said nothing of that to Neil, he might be still more angry if they told him. All kinds of wild ideas came into my head. To telephone them not to say anything to my husband about my second visit to the office—to tell him myself in the morning trusting that he would be over his anger by that time, even to deny having gone back if he was still cross, and they told him. But most of that long night I spent trying to convince myself that nothing I had heard derogatory to Neil was so—could possibly be true.

I rose early but he was in his bath even then. I imagined he too had not slept. I knew he had not undressed because he had not come after his nightclothes. He probably had thrown himself on the divan all dressed and got what rest he could. I felt so guilty. He had been travelling, a thing he hated. He never slept well on the train, and was always so glad to get home.

"There's nothing like a good bed," he used to say, "I'd never sleep on a train if I could possibly help it." Knowing how he felt made me even more guiltily conscious that I had kept him from his rest.

"Good morning," he said curtly when he came down to breakfast. I had hurried and was down before him.

"Good morning," I returned trying to speak naturally and brightly and making a dismal failure of it, but lifting my face for his usual morning kiss. He just brushed my cheek with his lips, then sat down and buried himself in his paper. I was uncomfortably conscious of his displeasure, and also afraid he might say something before the servants, a habit which had grown upon him. When we were first married he had been careful to discuss nothing of a personal nature before the servant, and I laid the growth of the habit now to what Lorraine had told me of his carelessness at Blanche Orton's, so giving her servants the chance to talk.

I watched him narrowly as I poured his coffee, but he never raised his eyes from the paper. Next I asked him a question about how he would like his eggs.

"I don't care" he snapped.

My eyes filled. He was still angry. But I would try again. I must placate him before he went down to the office. So I asked:

"Did you have a successful trip?"

"Successful enough!"

"Please Neil don't be so short with me. I have been so lonesome while you were away."

"You seem to have kept pretty busy, meddling with what don't concern you. I can't see that you have been very lonesome."

"Oh, Neil."—the butler left the room a moment, "please be nice to me."

"I will when you are also nice, as you call it. If you think it the part of a lady to play the spy I don't!" He flung from the table and from the house.
