WHALE HUNT IN SHETLAND

A correspondent writes:—Whiteness Voe, where the catch of whales of Aug. 24, 1900, was made, lies about twelve miles west of Lerwick. It is about two miles long and uniformly a quarter of a mile wide. It was about nine o'clock on the morning of this day last week when some sharp-eyed crofter spied the school blowing in the open sea outside. To Hoove, a small hamlet of some half a dozen houses, lies the credit of landing the whales. The male inhabitants are all more or less fisher folks, and the majority were engaged prosecuting the successful herring fishing at Lerwick with the local boats. About twenty women and a few men in half a dozen boats, formed the attacking party. They were armed with every form of lethal weapon from scythes downward. A cordon, such as it was, was drawn round the whales. Unsuspicious and riding high out of the waters, they formed a somewhat easy prey. Judicious manœuvring worked them well into the Voe, and, shouting vigorously, the attack was made. One cannot help wondering at the extreme ferocity, of the women. The huntresses tossed here and there in their boats by the dying struggles of the whales—the average length was twelve feet—but still savagely stabbing or gashing them with improvised spears and harpoons, the scene to an outsider, was one of sickening bloodshed. But still it is all gain and no loss, no nets to lose, nothing but mere killing. The writer asked one small boy what share he had in the capture. "I stood on the beach and hollered," he cheerfully remarked, "before daylight disappeared one hundred and twenty three whales were drawn ashore under the hamlet of Hoove.—Edinburgh Scotsman.
